to her covenant was a violation thereof by her, whether she knew of it or assented to it or not. Whenever that was done which she agreed should not be done, it was a breach of covenant by her, even if the act was contrary to her wishes, and in spite of her efforts to prevent it. Her covenant was against a certain act by any one of four persons, including herself. Two of those persons separately did the act which she had agreed that neither of them should do, and thus there was a violation of the covenant by her, the same as if she had done the act in person. The argument of the learned counsel for the defendant that the contract fixed a sum to be paid in case of a violation by the defendant, but not in case of a violation "by the other parties," while plausible, is unsound, for there were no "other parties" who could break the covenant. She was the sole covenantor, and unless she kept the covenant she broke it; and she did not keep it. As the actual damages for a breach of the covenant would necessarily be "wholly uncertain, and incapable of being ascertained except by conjecture," we think that the parties intended to liquidate them when they provided that the sum named should be "as stipulated damages." The use of the word "penalty" under the circumstances is not controlling. Bagley v. Peattie, 16 N. Y. 469; Dakin v. Williams, 17 Wend. 448, affirmed, 22 Wend. 201; Wooster v. Kisch, 26 Hun, 61.

As there is no other question that requires discussion, the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Van Syckel, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for damages for an alleged libel contained in the following letter, written by Oliver R. Dunkle, the cashier of the Merchants' Bank of Atlantic City:

"Robert Ohnmeiss, Esq.: Inclosed please find one share of Merchants' stock received some time ago. Our board refuses to purchase at present, but hold under advisement. We have stricken your name from the bond of Mr. Carl Voelker by request; also Samuel Rothholz's, as the latter has no financial standing. Respectfully, O. R. Dunkle, Cashier."

Robert Ohnmeiss was a stockholder in the same bank, and he and Rothholz, the plaintiff, were sureties on the official bond of Carl Voelker, an employé of the bank. Previous to the writing of this letter, Ohnmeiss had requested Dunkle to have his name stricken from the said bond, but did not make any inquiry with respect to the plaintiff, Rothholz. At the close of the plaintiff's case, the trial judge, regarding the communication a privileged one, ordered the plaintiff to be called. Whether, under the given circumstances, the nonsuit should have been ordered is the sole question in this court.

The statement that the plaintiff had no financial standing was libelous, and constituted a legal foundation for the recovery of damages, unless the occasion upon which it was uttered gave rise to the privilege of publishing what would otherwise be actionable. The term "privilege," as applied to a communication alleged to be libelous, means, simply, that the circumstances under which it was made are such as to repel the legal inference of malice, and to throw upon the plaintiff the burden of offering some evidence of its existence beyond the falsity of the charge. This court, in King v. Patterson, 49 N. J. L. 419, 8 Cent. Rep. 875, declared "that a communication, made bona fide, upon any subject matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has a duty, is privileged, if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it may contain criminal matter which, without this privilege, would be . . . actionable." In the case cited the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the court referred with approbation to Lawless v. Anglo-Egyptian C. & Oil Co. L. R. 4 Q. B. 262, and to Philadelphia, W. & B. R. Co. v. Quigley, 62 U. S. 21 How. 202, 16 L. ed. 73. The first of these cases was an action for libel against a corporation for publishing a report made to the company by auditors, in their audit of the manager's account, reflecting upon the plaintiff. The report was submitted at a general meeting of the shareholders of the company, and, under a resolution of the meeting, was printed and circulated among the shareholders. The court held that, inasmuch as it was the interest of all the shareholders to be informed of the report, the publication was privileged, on the ground, as Mellor, J., said, "that to print the report was a necessary and reasonable mode of communicating it to all the shareholders, who must be more or less numerous." In the second case a report made to stockholders in writing, and printed, with respect to the capacity and skill of one of the company's employés, was held to be a privileged communication. These cases are referred to for the purpose of showing that a communication to a shareholder of a corporation touching matters which concern the corporate body are within the rule of privilege, which secures the immunity to the official who makes the publication. Ohnmeiss being not only a co-surety with Rothholz upon the official bond of Voelker, but also a shareholder in the bank, he had the right to receive the information imparted to him by Dunkle, the cashier. The fact that Rothholz's name had been taken from a bond held by the bank, and the reason for removing it, was a matter which concerned Ohnmeiss. As a stockholder he could justly have complained if a competent security had been improperly surrendered by those who conducted the affairs of the bank. It was not necessary, to justify the communication, that it should have been in response to an inquiry made by Ohnmeiss.

In Waller v. Lock, 45 L. T. N. S. 248, Jessel, M. R., says: "If an answer is given in the discharge of a social or moral duty, or if the person who gives it thinks it to be so, that is enough. It need not even be an answer to an inquiry, but the communication may be a voluntary one." In my judgment, the circumstances under which the letter was written upon which this suit is based, repel the inference of an improper motive on the part of defendant, and cast upon the plaintiff the burden of proving malice.

No evidence having been produced in the trial court to show malice in the publication, the non-suit was properly ordered, and the judgment below should be affirmed.

TEXAS SUPREME COURT.

J. S. SELLERS, Appt.,

(.....Tex.....)

No reservation of a right to flood lands, conveyed by a railroad company, with water of a river backed up by the faulty construction of the embankment on which its tracks are laid, will be implied from the mere fact that the conveyance was made after the embankment was finished.

NOTE.—Implied reservations.

It is now settled law in England that a reservation out of a grant will not be implied except in case of necessity. Crossley v. Lightowler, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 478.

The right to foul a stream from dye works cannot be reserved by implication. Id.

Neither will an easement of light and air for windows be so reserved on the sale of a vacant lot. Wheeldon v. Burrows, L. R. 12 Ch. Div. 81; White v. Bass, 7 Hurlst. & N. 722; Ellis v. Manchester Carriage Co. L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 18; Russell v. Watts, L. R. 25 Ch. Div. 559.

Nor an easement for the projection of bowsprits of large vessels at a dock over a neighboring coal wharf on the sale of the latter. Suffield v. Brown, 4 De G. J. & S. 185.

Of right of way.

An implied reservation of a right of way over land sold will be made only in case of strict and absolute necessity (Shoemaker v. Shoemaker, 11 Abb. N.C. 80); and not of a way merely for convenience. Mitchell v. Seipel, 53 Md. 251.

But it may be upheld in case of an alley over premises sold with a house where it is the only means of access to another house. Durel v. Boisblanc, 1 La. Ann. 407.

And in Pennsylvania the use of an alley which was open and apparent, having a gate set up, was held to be reserved though not strictly a way of necessity. Cannon v. Boyd, 73 Pa. 179.

An express reservation of an archway on the sale of a house was held to imply a reservation of the use of a passageway under it to reach a stable in the rear. Davies v. Sears, L. R. 7 Eq. Cas. 427.

On the other hand, a right of way of necessity is not reserved where the grantor expressly releases an existing right of way although his land is thus left entirely shut in from the public road. Richards v. Attleboro Branch R. Co. 153 Mass. 120.

These two cases last referred to may perhaps be considered as turning on the construction of the contracts rather than on the question of implied reservation.

Of stairways and hallways.

An easement of evident necessity in stairways and hallways is reserved on the sale of part of a building. Dillman v. Hoffman, 38 Wis. 559; Thompson v. Miner, 30 Iowa, 386.

The same rule applies where a lessee sublets the first floor of the building so arranged that the necessity of his own use of the stairway, hall, etc., is apparent. Benedict v. Barling (Wis.) May 5, 1891.

In Wisconsin a reasonable necessity as distinguished from an absolute necessity is sufficient to sustain an implied reservation of the use of stairways, etc. Galloway v. Bonesteel, 65 Wis. 80.

But such use of stairways is not reserved where other independent entrances exist. Outerbridge v. Phelps, 58 How. Pr. 77; Schrymser v. Phelps, 62 How. Pr. 1.

Of dam and race.

In Pennsylvania the use of a dam and race on land sold for supplying with water a mill retained by the grantor was held to be reserved by implication. Selbert v. Levan, 8 Pa. 383.

There are exactly contrary decisions in New York and Maine. Burr v. Mills, 21 Wend. 290; Preble v. Reed, 17 Me. 175.

In New Jersey a similar reservation of the use of a spring and an artificial conduit on land sold for the benefit of a paper mill on another tract was upheld; the court, like the courts of Pennsylvania, seeming to extend the doctrine of implied reservations beyond cases of strict necessity. Seymour v. Lewis, 13 N. J. Eq. 439.

Of use of drain.

No implied reservation of the use of a drain which is not apparent exists on the sale of premises over which it runs, at least where another could be made at reasonable expense, and therefore such use is not a necessity. Randall v. McLaughlin, 10 Allen, 386; Carbrey v. Willis, 7 Allen, 369; Butterworth v. Crawford, 46 N. Y. 349; Scott v. Deutel, 23 Gratt. 1. Contra, Pyer v. Carter, 1 Hurlst. & N. 916. But this last case has been completely overruled in the later English cases cited at the beginning of this note.

There is another class of cases, not considered in this note which relate to easements, where the premises affected are sold simultaneously to different purchasers.

R. A. R.

Gaines, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant brought this action to recover of the Texas Central Railway Company, and of Dillingham and Clark, as receivers of its property, operating its railroad, damages for the destruction of a stock of goods by an overflow of the Bosque River. The overflow was alleged to have resulted from the negligent construction of the bed of the railroad across the valley of the river. The defendant filed a special answer to the petition, in which it was averred, in substance, that at the time the railroad was constructed the Railroad Company owned the land along the river at the place of the embankment, including as a part thereof the lot upon which the plaintiff's goods were stored at the time of the overflow, and that the plaintiff held the lot "under a purchaser from said Company, who purchased the same after the erection of said railroad and embankment,

... whose title was governed by a conveyance from said Company, containing a clause warranting the title to the same against all persons claiming or to claim the same by, through, or under its assigns or successors." It was also alleged that the parcel of land so conveyed was a lot in a town which had been laid off by the company prior to the conveyance, and that at the time the Company sold this lot it also sold other lots in the town to other persons. The plaintiff demurred to this special answer, but the demurrer was overruled. The sufficiency of the answer is practically the only question presented by this appeal. The determination of the appeal resolves itself into the inquiry whether in the conveyance of the lot by the Company there was an implied reservation of the right to flood the granted premises in case of freshets by retaining the embankment as it then existed. The questions of grant of easements by implication, and of implied reservations of easements, have given rise to much conflict of opinion. A distinction is generally recognized between an implied grant and an implied reservation. It is conceded to be the settled law in England "that, when the owner of two adjoining lots sells one, he does not reserve impliedly for the benefit of the other any easements except those of a strict necessity; . . . but that he does impliedly grant to the grantee all continuous and apparent easements which are necessary for the reasonable use of the property granted, and which have been or are at the time of the grant used by the owner of the entirety for the benefit of the part granted." Washb. Easem. 4th ed. p. 105.

The reason for denying a reservation by implication is that to permit it would be to allow the grantor to derogate from the grant. Many of the American courts of the highest authority adhere to the English doctrine as to implied reservations, though there are others which lay down a rule more favorable to the grantor. The Supreme Court of Maine has decided that "where the owner of land flowed by a mill-dam sells the mill and dam, and retains the land, the right to flow the land to the extent it was then flowed without payment of damages passes by the grant; but where the owner sells the land flowed, and retains the mill and dam without reserving the right to flow, he is not protected from the payment of damages." Preble v. Reed, 17 Me. 169; Burr v. Mills, 21 Wend. 289; Goddard, Easem. 124; Washb. Easem. 4th ed. 54; Gould, Waters, § 354.

Even those courts which hold that a reservation of an easement may be implied beyond strict necessity restrict the rule to such easements as are "apparent and continuous." An apparent easement is one which is obvious. Applying that rule to the facts of this case, can it be said that it obviously appeared to the purchaser that the lot which was sold was flooded by the embankment? The embankment itself was doubtless obvious enough. But it would seem to us that the purchaser might have reasonably presumed that the Company had availed itself of competent engineering skill, and had so constructed its works as not to impede the natural flow of the water. Under such circumstances, we think it should not be held that the company, by mere implication, reserved a right to flow the land without paying damages therefor. There is much that commends them to favorable consideration in the remarks upon the question of Chief Justice Ryan, of the Supreme Court of Wisconsin: "We may say, however, in passing, that it is always safest to let written contracts speak for themselves. This rule is often relaxed with doubtful expediency. Parties ought to make their own contracts complete. Alienations of land are, or ought to be, grave and deliberate transactions. Every conveyance should contain 'the certainty of the thing granted to the full extent of the grant.' What may be expressed enlarging or restricting the grant in particular cases should not be left to implication. It is often difficult, as the cases show, to determine what shall be implied in conveyances by way of grant or reservation of easement; what parties who might have spoken shall be held to intend by their silence; and, because 'a deed shall be construed most strongly against the grantor,' this view applies with great force against implied reservations in the servient estate conveyed by the owner of the dominant estate. Indeed, it is remarkable that the doctrine of implied grant of easement in the land of the grantor once rested very much on the principle that the grantor should not be heard to derogate from his grant (Horton v. Frearson, 8 T. R. 50); and yet the same doctrine has been extended to implied reservations to the grantor in what he conveys, in direct derogation of his grant. On principle, therefore, we should be disinclined to enlarge or limit estates granted by implication of law, further than a general current of decisions might oblige us." Dillman v. Hoffman, 38 Wis. 573. We think there was no implied reservation in this case, and that the demurrer to the answer should have been sustained. The defendant receivers put in a demurrer to the petition, which was overruled by the court. The appellees have filed no cross-assignments of error, and the question of their liability is not before the court. The counsel for appellees admit this.

For the error of the court in sustaining the demurrer to the special answer, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

A. H. ALSTON et al., Appts.,
v.

STATE OF ALABAMA.

1. The addition to the name of the depositor in an account with a bank of the words "judge of probate, license money," is not alone sufficient to make deposits on such account special.
2. A judge of probate cannot relieve himself from the duty imposed upon him by law of turning over to the State all moneys received by him as license fees by showing that it had been lost by the failure of a bank in which he had deposited it in good faith at a time when it enjoyed the confidence of the business world, where the deposits made were general ones, since he had no right to make such deposit under the Code provision that he could not use the money himself or permit anyone else to use it.

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Barbour County in favor of plaintiff in an action on the official bond of defendant, Alston, to recover the amount of license money which he had received and neglected to turn over to the State. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. Lawrence H. Lee and Peach & Evans for appellants.

Mr. William L. Martin, Atty.-Gen., for the State:

A credit given for the amount of a check by the bank upon which it is drawn is equivalent to and will be treated as a payment of the check. It is the same as if the money had been paid over the counter on the check and then immediately paid back to the account of the depositor.

Whether the deposit here in question was general or special is immaterial. The bank is bound to exercise ordinary care and no more in keeping a special deposit.

York County v. Watson, 15 S. C. 1, 40 Am. Rep. 675, which holds to the contrary view, seems to stand alone.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In such cases as the law prescribes a state or county license to engage in or carry on any business, or to do any act, the amount required for such license must be paid to the probate judge of the county in which it is proposed to engage in or carry on such business or to do such act. The money so paid for licenses being part of the revenue of the State or county, as the case may be, and received by the probate judge in his official capacity, he is prohibited, under criminal penalties, from knowingly converting or applying any of it to his own use, or to the use of any other person, or permitting another to use any of it; and he must, on the last day of each quarter, pay to the state treasurer the money received by him for such licenses belonging to the State, and to the county treasurer the money received by him for such licenses belonging to the county, less the amount of the commissions allowed to him by law. Code 1886, §§ 632, 633, 3803, 3805. The plain statutory requirements here referred to exert a controlling influence in the determination of the question presented in this case by the contention that the failure of the defendant Alston to pay to the State certain license money, which he collected, and with which he is chargeable as probate judge, should be excused on the ground that said license money has been lost by reason of the failure of a bank in which it had been deposited, at a time when said bank enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the business world, and of the embarrassment of which said Alston had no reason to know or suspect until after the failure was publicly announced. Can this excuse avail as a defense to the suit of the State to recover the amount of its license money so lost? This inquiry involves the question of right of the probate judge to make the deposit as he did. Alston, as probate judge, accepted payment of the license money in the check of the licensee, made payable "to county and State of Ala., or bearer." This check Alston presented to the bank, and had the amount thereof put to his credit on an account entered on the books of the bank with "A. H. Alston, Judge of Probate, License Money." Deposits made with bankers are either general or special. In the case of a special deposit, the bank merely assumes the charge or custody of property, without authority to use it, and the depositor is entitled to receive back the identical money or thing deposited. In such case, the right of property remains in the depositor, and, if the deposit is of money, the bank may not mingle it with its own funds. The relation created is that of bailor and bailee, and not that of creditor and debtor. Boyden v. Bank of Cape Fear, 65 N. C. 13; Davison v. Real Estate Bank, 5 Ark. 297; Lourey v. Polk County, 51 Iowa, 50; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 93; 1 Morse, Banks & Banking, § 188 et seq.

When a money deposit is made, it is to be regarded as a general deposit, unless there is evidence to show that it was the bank's duty, by agreement, express or clearly implied, to keep it separate and apart from its own funds, and to return that identical money to the depositor. Money received by a bank on general deposit becomes the property of the bank, and can be loaned or otherwise used by it, as other moneys belonging to it. The bank becomes the debtor of the depositor, and its obligation is satisfied by honoring the depositor's checks to the amount of his deposit. The depositor's claim is a mere chose in action for so much money. He becomes a creditor of the bank. Bank of the Republic v. Millard, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 152, 19 L. ed. 897; 2 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 93, 94.

The words, "judge of probate, license money," annexed to the name of the depositor, served to distinguish that particular account, and to keep it separate from other dealings he might have with the bank. Moneys deposited on an account kept in that form would be more readily traced, and the bank, perhaps, would be chargeable with notice of the source from which the depositor derived funds which he directed to be credited to him in that way. But the addition of the words referred to would not operate to change the character of the deposit from a general to a special one. There is nothing to indicate that the amount charged against itself by the bank on this account was kept separate or unmingled with its own property. The contrary appears. Manifestly, the bank did not undertake to become the bailee of that license money. The effect of the transaction was simply to substitute one person to another's position, as a creditor of the bank, to the amount of the check deposited. The maker of the check had no property in the funds of the bank by virtue of his account therewith. The entry of the amount of the check on Alston's account was but a shifting of the bank's liability. So far as Alston was concerned, the bank, by accepting the deposit, merely became his debtor, and assumed the obligation to honor his checks to the amount so credited to him. Havens v. Lathene, 75 N. C. 505; McLain v. Wallace, 108 Ind. 562, 8 West. Rep. 359; 1 Morse, Banks & Banking, 3d ed. § 183; 2 Morse, Banks & Banking, 3d ed. § 604.

The money of the State was thus turned over to the bank on general deposit, and became a part of its funds, and subject to its use, as any other of its property. This use of the public money by the probate judge was without 13 L. R. A.

warrant of law. He had no right to convert it to his own use, or permit anyone else to use it. The deposit was of like effect as a loan of the money. It was an unauthorized use thereof. The probate judge by that act voluntarily relinquished his custody and control of this public fund, so that he could not reclaim it. When the State demands it, his answer is that he no longer has it, but has a claim for the amount thereof against an insolvent bank. In view of the statutory provisions above referred to, we think that this answer is wholly insufficient as a defense. The effect of the Statute is to make the probate judge the custodian of that money, and to prohibit him from permitting another to use it. Whether or not it would have been wise to authorize the deposit of the public funds in banks of reputed solvency was a matter for legislative determination. The Legislature has prohibited any such disposition of public moneys as is effected by a general deposit thereof in bank. The courts cannot recognize as legitimate and excusable that which the statutes have forbidden. They are without power to dispense with the requirements of the Statute, though it may be apparent that the defendant did not knowingly violate the law; that, in making the deposit, he was acting under a generally prevailing misapprehension that such disposition of public moneys was authorized; and that he may have honestly thought that it was the safest and most prudent thing to do, under the circumstances, until the arrival of the time when he was required to make payment to the State. The deposit itself having been unlawful, a violation of an official duty, and a breach of the condition of the bond, a defense which necessarily involves reliance upon that act as valid and authorized must unavoidably fail. Lourey v. Polk County, 51 Iowa, 50; Ward v. Colfax Co. School Dist. No. 15, 10 Neb. 294.

It would be outside of the issues in this case to undertake to specify what would be regarded as a discharge by an officer intrusted with public money of the duty to keep it safely until he is required to pay it over. In the case of State v. Houston, 78 Ala. 576, the defense that certain tax money which had not been paid over was taken from the collector's person by a robbery was set up in a suit on the tax collector's bond. The court there stated the elements essential to the validity of that defense. Clopton, J., delivering the opinion, said: "If, having observed the highest care, vigilance, and diligence to prevent loss, the collector is robbed of money belonging to the State by irresistible force, it constitutes a valid defense to an action on his bond for the recovery of such money. We say, 'money belonging to the State;' for, if it appears that the specific funds received by the collector have been used or changed for any unauthorized purpose, he becomes eo instanti a debtor, and he and his sureties are bound to absolute payment, as for a debt. In such case, subsequent robbery of money, substituted for the amount misused, is no defense. The robbery must be of money, the property of the State."

In the present case, as has been shown, the absolute liability, as for a debt, was fixed upon the probate judge and the sureties on his bond by the unauthorized deposit in bank; so that no question is presented as to what the liability would have been if the probate judge had not voluntarily relinquished his custody of that license money. In the absence of any specific regulation as to the mode or place of keeping public funds, it would seem that the question as to whether or not the custody over them has been maintained with the highest degree of care, vigilance and diligence known to the law would depend, in a measure, upon the particular situation of the officer charged with the preservation thereof, and upon the existence of means available to him of providing a place of safe keeping. This decision does not involve the assertion that the security afforded by bank vaults may not in any case be availed of by an officer intrusted with the custody of public moneys.

Affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

H. W. PICKETT, Admr., etc., of John W. Moore, Deceased,
v.
PACIFIC MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE CO. of California, Appt.

1. Death from asphyxia, occasioned by deadly gas in a shallow well, into which one descends to fix a pump, is caused by external, violent and accidental means.
2. "Inhalation of gas," causing death, within the meaning of a clause exempting an insurer from liability, does not include the involuntary inhaling of deadly gas in a well where its presence is unsuspected.

(October 5, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Warren County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance. Affirmed.

The material portions of the policy on which this suit was brought are as follows:

"The Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California, in consideration of the warranties in the application for this insurance, and the stipulations herein contained, . . . does hereby insure John W. Moore, by occupation, profession or employment a contractor and driller, . . . in the principal sum of five thousand dollars, for the term of twelve months, ending on the fourth day of June, eighteen hundred and ninety, at twelve o'clock noon. The said sum to be paid to the legal representative of the insured, after due notice and satisfactory proof that the insured has, during the continuance of this policy, sustained such violent and accidental injuries as shall externally be visible upon his person, and which alone shall have caused his death within ninety days of the date of such accident. . . . Except that if injured in any occupation or exposure classed by the company as more hazardous than here specified, then the insurance and weekly indemnity shall be for such amounts as the premium paid will purchase at the rates fixed by this company for such increased hazard."

On the back of the policy, and made a part thereof by agreement, were the following conditions:

"The insured agrees to use due diligence for personal safety and protection. . . .

"This insurance shall not cover disappearances, nor injuries of which there is no visible external mark upon the body of the insured; nor death or injury resulting from or attributable partially or wholly to any of the following causes: . . . taking of poison, contact with poisonous substances, inhalation of gas. . . ."

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. D. I. Ball and C. C. Thompson, for appellant:

It cannot be contended that the clause "inhalation of gas" should be limited to a voluntary and conscious "inhalation of gas," because, (1) it is not so written in the policy,—if so intended, the word "involuntary" would have been expressed in this list of the classes of injuries to which the policy does not apply, instead of being left to be understood; (2) this court has adjudicated that these exceptions apply to the involuntary as well as voluntary acts of the insured.

Pollock v. United States Mut. Acc. Asso. 102 Pa. 230.

The policy provides that its amount shall be paid after due notice and satisfactory proof that the insured has, during the continuance of this policy, sustained such violent and accidental injuries as shall externally be visible upon his person, and which alone shall have caused his death. There is no pretense of any evidence of violent and accidental injuries externally visible upon the person of Mr. Moore; and therefore, under the foregoing provision of this policy, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover.

This distinguishes the case from Mallory v. Travelers Ins. Co. 47 N. Y. 52; Paul v. Travelers Ins. Co. 3 L. R. A. 343, 112 N. Y. 477; and McGlinchey v. Fidelity & C. Co. 6 New Eng. Rep. 450, 80 Me. 251.

Messrs. Noyes & Hinckley and Brown, Stone & Rice, for appellee:

The contention of the defendant that in a case like this, or in those cases of accidental injury causing immediate death, resulting from drowning, suffocation, choking, all cases of asphyxia, lightning, electricity, or in any case of death from violent external means, it becomes necessary to show more than the body of the deceased, is repugnant to common sense and unreasonable.

NOTE.—Insurance: death from inhaling gas.

In exact conflict with the above case, and with the leading case of Paul v. Travelers Ins. Co. 3 L. R. A. 443, 112 N. Y. 472, which this case follows, is the 13 L. R. A.

case of Richardson v. Travelers Ins. Co., 46 Fed. Rep. 843, which holds that death by inhaling illuminating gas in a sleeping room is within an exemption as to liability for death from "inhaling gas." B. A. R.

See Mallory v. Travelers Ins. Co. 47 N. Y. 52.

This provision of the policy as to external injuries has received consideration and construction in a long line of cases, beginning in the highest English courts and followed in the United States and state courts of this country.

Sterrett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The undisputed facts, upon which the jury in this case was instructed to find for the plaintiff the full amount of his claim, are briefly as follows: On June 4, 1889, the plaintiff's intestate, John W. Moore, received and paid for the policy of insurance on which this suit was brought, a copy of which will be found in the record. Returning to his boarding house, same evening, he informed his landlady that he had no dinner, and requested that his supper be prepared. He then went to the well in the open yard for a drink and finding that the pump required priming with water, he remarked that he would fix it, so as to obviate that difficulty in the future. After procuring a hatchet, and removing planks from the opening at the top, he descended into the dug-out portion of the well, which was four or five feet wide and only ten or twelve feet deep, for the purpose of closing a small opening in the iron pipe, about midway down. A few minutes later his lifeless remains were found at the bottom of the well. He died from asphyxia, or suffocation, due to the accidental and unconscious inhalation of carbonic acid or other deadly gas that had unexpectedly accumulated in the dug-out portion of the shallow well. The well, with which deceased was familiar, and in which he had been shortly before, was one of those known as a "driven well," made by driving an iron pipe into the ground to the depth, in this case, of about forty feet. For the distance of about ten or twelve feet from the top the earth around the iron pipe was dug out so as to form, as above stated, an open well, of about four or five feet in diameter, in which there was little or no water. The top of the well was covered with plank. The deceased was a strong, healthy man. His sudden and wholly unexpected death, under the circumstances above stated, and within a few hours after he had procured the policy of insurance, undoubtedly resulted from external, violent, and accidental injuries or means, and without any conscious or voluntary act on his part. There was no evidence, nor was it even suggested, that he had committed suicide, or that he was wanting in reasonable care, or that he voluntarily exposed himself to danger. In describing the condition in which he found the body of deceased the physician who made the post mortem examination testified: "The surface of the body was of a livid bluish color. The lips and tongue were blue, the right side of the head was partially distended with dark blood. The left side was nearly empty. The lungs contained more blood than they would under different circumstances. They were somewhat congested. The pulmonary arteries were distended with blood. The liver was slightly congested, and also the kidneys. There was, however, no disease of the kidneys, no disease of any of the internal organs. . . . His death was caused by asphyxia, due to the inhalation of gas." If the latter undisputed and undoubtedly correct conclusion of fact needed any confirmation, it may be found in the testimony as to the effect of the same noxious gas on those who went to the relief of the deceased, and assisted in removing his remains from the well. It shows how narrowly they escaped a similar violent and accidental death. The notice and proofs of death were full and complete. Their sufficiency was not even questioned.

In view of the undisputed facts, of which the above is an outline, the learned president of the common pleas refused to affirm defendant's points for charge, some of which are predicated of the foregoing facts, and instructed the jury that upon the undisputed facts before them the plaintiff was entitled to recover; and there was accordingly a verdict and judgment in his favor. This action of the court in refusing defendant's points and instructing the jury in plaintiff's favor are the subjects of complaint in the several specifications of error. The first and main point was as follows: "The clause in the policy of insurance sued on, to wit: 'This insurance shall not cover . . . death or injury resulting from or attributable partially or wholly to . . . inhalation of gas,'—applies to the case of death resulting from asphyxia caused by inhaling gas accumulated at the bottom of the well." This, in connection with the remaining seven points, was rightly refused. According to the undisputed facts above referred to, the death of the insured was caused by external, violent, and accidental means, and without any conscious or voluntary act on his part. No one knowing, as he did, the shallowness of the dug-out portion of the well, would ever suspect the presence of noxious gas therein. Doubtless he never for a moment contemplated the slightest danger. His death was purely accidental; quite as much so as if he had been suddenly and unexpectedly engulfed in water, and drowned. The deadly but invisible gas by which he was unconsciously and accidentally enveloped was undoubtedly the external and violent cause of his injury and death. According to the physician's testimony, above quoted, its violent effect upon the vital organs of the deceased was plainly visible at the time of the post mortem examination. As was well said in Paul v. Travelers Ins. Co., 112 N. Y. 472, 3 L. R. A. 443 (which in principle rules this case): "As to the point raised by appellant, that the death was not caused by external and violent means, within the meaning of the policy, we think it a sufficient answer that the gas in the atmosphere, as an external cause, was a violent agency, in the sense that it worked upon the intestate so as to cause his death. That a death is the result of accident, or is unnatural, imports an external and violent agency as the cause." In that case the policy on which suit was brought provided that the insurance should not extend to death caused "by inhaling gas." It appeared that the insured was found dead in bed. Gas had escaped in the room, and death was caused by breathing the atmosphere of the room filled with gas. It was held that death was not caused by the inhaling of gas, within the meaning of the policy. The company relied upon the same narrow and technical defense that is made by the defendant in this case. In an able opinion, reported in 45 Hun, 313, the learned judge of the general term, whose judgment was afterwards affirmed by the court of appeals, said, inter alia: "Was the death of the intestate caused by or through 'external, violent, and accidental means,' within the language of the policy? . . . We should say the death was due to external and violent means as clearly as drowning. . . . The cause of death came from outside as surely as would a rifle ball, or water in the case of drowning. The escape of gas into the room was violent in the same sense that would be the flow of water into a wrecked vessel. In either case, the external means constitute the cause which produces death. It is a violent death, produced by an external power, not natural. Some poisons, such as opium and chloral, produce no violent action on the human system. The man who descends into a well of carbonic acid gas is killed with no greater violence, perhaps, than was the intestate. Yet in all these cases the result would be called a violent death. . . . We also think the words 'inhaling of gas' were used to designate those common uses of gas in dentistry, surgery, etc. . . . Evidently an exception from death caused by a surgical operation was not broad enough to include the use of anesthetics preparatory to the operation. It contemplated a voluntary and intelligent act by the assured, not an involuntary and unconscious act." On this question, the court of appeals, in affirming the decision of the general term, said: "A careful consideration of this instrument, and of the scope and design of its provisions, leads us to the conclusion that appellant must fail in its contention. . . . In expressing its intention not to be liable for death from 'inhaling of gas' the company can only be understood to mean a voluntary and intelligent act of the insured, and not an involuntary and unconscious act. Read in that sense; and in the light of the context, these words must be interpreted as having reference to medical or surgical treatment, in which ex vi termini would be included the dentist's work or a suicidal purpose. Of course, the deceased must have, in a certain sense, inhaled gas; but, in view of the finding that death was caused by accidental means, the proper meaning of the words compels, as does the logic of the thing, the conclusion that there was not that voluntary or conscious act necessarily involved in the process of inhaling. An accident is the happening of an event without the aid and the design of the person, and which is unforeseen.

. . . To inhale gas requires an act of volition on the person's part before the danger is incurred. Poison may be taken by mistake, or poisonous substances may be inadvertently touched; but, whatever the motive of the insured, his act precedes either fact. . . . If the policy had said that it was not to extend to any death caused wholly or in part by gas, it would have expressed precisely what the appellant now says is meant by the present phrase, and there could have been no room for doubt or mistake. Policies of insurance are to be liberally construed, and as in all contracts conditions are to be construed strictly against those for whose benefit they are reserved."

The principles, so well stated and enforced in the cases above cited, were afterwards approvingly considered in Bacon v. United States Mut. Acc. Assn. 123 N. Y. 804, 9 L. R. A. 617. In further support of same principles, reference might be made to other authorities,—among which are: May, Ins. 631, in which reference is made to Trew v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 5 Hurlst. & N. 211; Winspar v. Accident Ins. Co. 29 Moak, Eng. Rep. 488; Accident Ins. Co. of North America v. Crandal, 120 U. S. 532, 30 L. ed. 742; Mallory v. Travelers Ins. Co. 47 N. Y. 52; North American L. & Acc. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. 43; McGlinchey v. Fidelity & C. Co. 80 Me. 251, 6 New Eng. Rep. 450; Eggenberger v. Guarantee Mut. Acc. Assn. 41 Fed. Rep. 172; United States Mut. Acc. Assn. v. Newman, 84 Va. 52,—but further elaboration is unnecessary.

This case is not ruled by Pollock v. United States Mut. Acc. Assn., 102 Pa. 230, on which defendant relies. While that case may well stand upon its own peculiar facts, we think the present case is clearly distinguishable in its controlling facts as well as in the principles applicable to them. In that case the injury did not result from external, violent and accidental means. The fatal drug was voluntarily and intentionally taken by the deceased. In deciding that case this court never could have intended to lay down the broad rule that in construing an accident policy there is no distinction between external, violent, and accidental causes of death, and those cases in which death results from voluntary acts. What was decided in that case was that, under the various clauses of the policy sued on, there could be no recovery, and it was unimportant whether the means arose from the designing act of the insured or otherwise.

Another ground of defense suggested in defendant's 5th, 6th, and 7th points was that the deceased was injured in an occupation or exposure classed by the company as more hazardous than that specified in the policy, etc. The points referred to appear to be predicated of testimony which was improperly before the jury. The Company, in disregard of the provisions of the Act of May 11, 1881 (P. L. 20), had failed to attach to the policy copies of the by-laws or application, and should not have been permitted, against plaintiff's objection, to give them in evidence. The Act was passed in the interest of honesty and fair dealing, and its provisions should be strictly enforced. We have no doubt they apply to such companies as the defendant.

Without further referring to the specifications of error, it is sufficient to say that neither of them is sustained. The deceased was accidentally, violently, and fatally asphyxiated by the unknown presence of a fluid foreign to his person. If that fluid had been oil, smoke, water, or molten metal, the result would have been substantially the same. Death, caused not so much by the inhalation of the fluid as by its action in excluding life-supporting air, would have inevitably resulted. A fair construction of the policy leads to the conclusion reached by the court below, that death resulting from causes such as killed the intestate is not within any of the exemptions relied on by the Company.

Judgment affirmed.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Charles F. HARRINGTON

v.
CITY OF PORT HURON, Appt.,

(..... Mich.)

Ejectment is not the proper remedy to procure the discontinuance of a sewer which was constructed by a city over lands of the United States government which was afterwards conveyed to plaintiff, where the only facts that appear are that the sewer was constructed and was thereafter continuously applied to its proper use without being fenced in or anything done to prevent plaintiff from taking possession of the land.

(Morse, J., dissents.)

NOTE.—What disseisin will support ejectment.

Actual personal presence of the defendant on the land is not necessary; any subjection to his will and domain excluding the plaintiff is sufficient. Bell v. Foxen, 14 Sawy. 799, 42 Fed. Rep. 755.

Wrongful permanent possession, whether it arises from a dispute as to boundary or otherwise, is a sufficient disseisin. Leprell v. Kleinschmidt, 112 N. Y. 364.

A claim of title by a trespasser may be regarded as a disseisin. Chilson v. Buttolph, 12 Vt. 231.

So under 2 N. Y. Rev. Stat., § 304, § 4, may a verbal claim to unoccupied land. Banyer v. Emple, 5 Hill, 48.

But a mere claim of possession and title by one who has committed no actual trespass on the land is insufficient. Grignon v. Black, 76 Wis. 674.

A claim of an easement simply (here the use of a wharf) is not a sufficient disseisin to support ejectment. Child v. Chappell, 9 N. Y. 246.

The same rule was applied to a claim of an easement to flow land. Wilklow v. Lane, 37 Barb. 244.

So the flowing of land by a dam will not support ejectment in favor of one who has only a right to mines in the land. Ezzard v. Findley Gold Min. Co. 74 Ga. 520.

Wrongfully insisting on remaining in the house of plaintiff, who is occupying it, will not make a case for ejectment. Buchanan v. Streper, 12 Phila. 520.

Projection of eaves, walls, etc.

The projection of a roof over land makes a case for ejectment. Murphy v. Bolger, 1 L. R. A. 300, 60 Vt. 723; Sherry v. Freeking, 4 Duer, 452. Contra, Aiken v. Benedict, 39 Barb. 409; Vrooman v. Jackson, 6 Hun, 326.

It will be noticed that the earlier of the three New York cases cited is overruled by the two later ones; but the question has not been passed upon by the court of last resort in that State which incidentally noticed the question but did not decide it in the case of Leprell v. Kleinschmidt, 112 N. Y. 364.

So the projection of some of the stones of a foundation wall will support the action. McCourt v. Eckstein, 22 Wis. 153.

APPEAL by defendant from the judgment of the Circuit Court for St. Clair County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the possession of certain land over which defendant had constructed a sewer. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. E. Chadwick, with Mr. Frank T. Wolcott, for appellant.

The second count is wholly insufficient to admit of any evidence, or as the foundation of any judgment.

How. Stat. 7795; White v. Hapeman, 43 Mich. 267; Twoood v. Hoyt, 42 Mich. 609.

Disseisin of owner where lands are subject to highway or other easement.

The owner of the fee may maintain ejectment for land subject to a public way against one who claims as owner. Goodtitle v. Alker, 1 Burr. 133; Jackson v. Hathaway, 15 Johns. 447; Etz v. Daily, 20 Barb. 32; Brown v. Galley, Hill & Denio, Supp. 308; Wright v. Carter, 27 N. J. L. 77; Gardiner v. Tisdale, 2 Wis. 153. Contra, Cincinnati v. White, 31 U. S. 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 452.

It will lie also for premises subject to an easement where plaintiff's rights in the land are denied. The Edmondson Island Case, 42 Fed. Rep. 15.

A turnpike company may also maintain the action for an encroachment upon its road. Borough of Chambersburg v. Manko, 39 N. J. L. 496.

So it will lie against a railroad company which is in a street without any right as against the owner in fee. Sharpe v. St. Louis & S. E. R. Co. 49 Ind. 206; Lozier v. New York Cent. R. Co. 42 Barb. 465; Carpenter v. Oswego & S. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 655; Wager v. Troy Union R. Co. 25 N. Y. 526, overruling Redfield v. Utica & S. R. Co. 25 Barb. 54.

It is also proper where defendants have entered and built a wharf and pier on lands of a city and are taking wharfage. New York v. Law, 125 N. Y. 380.

Public use as a disseisin.

Similar to the main case as involving the question of disseisin by the public are the following: Ejectment will lie against a city where land is taken without right for a highway denying the rights of the owner of the fee. Armstrong v. St. Louis, 69 Mo. 309; Strong v. Brooklyn, 68 N. Y. 1.

Also against a county for lands laid out as a public road by void proceedings. McCarty v. Clark County, 101 Mo. 179.

In an earlier New York case it was held that the action would not lie against a city where land was taken for a street, but it did not appear that the ownership of the fee was denied. Cowenhoven v. Brooklyn, 38 Barb. 9.

So the action lies for land occupied by a city as an approach and landing for a swing bridge. Lowe v. Kaukauna, 70 Wis. 306.
B. A. R.

A corporation cannot maintain ejectment for a mere easement.

Bay County v. Bradley, 39 Mich. 163; Grand Rapids v. Whittlesey, 33 Mich. 109; Taylor v. Gladwin, 40 Mich. 232.

Such an easement is but an incorporeal hereditament.

3 Kent, Com. 419, and cases cited; Taylor v. Gladwin, supra; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 375.

It must follow, as a corollary on this, that if a municipal corporation cannot maintain ejectment for an easement, because having no title or right to its exclusive possession, or of the land subject to it, the same reasons prohibit a like action against it.

The plaintiff is the undisputed legal owner and in possession of this whole tract so far as it is capable of possession, or he chooses to exercise it.

How. Stat. 8701.

He cannot maintain ejectment for the whole tract while himself in undisputed possession of a part.

Rea v. Rea, 5 West. Rep. 911, 63 Mich. 257, 262.

If he sought to recover a part only, he must describe that part from which he is evicted and excluded with certainty, and such certainty as without extraneous aid it can be ascertained and admeasured.

King v. Merritt, 11 West. Rep. 291; 67 Mich. 195, 210; White v. Hapeman, 43 Mich. 267.

Messrs. Avery Brothers, for appellee:

Our Statute allows ejectment against any "person exercising acts of ownership on the premises claimed or claiming title thereto, or some interest therein."

How. Stat. 7791.

The acts of ouster in this case are much more pronounced than were those of the defendant in Cole v. Wells, 49 Mich. 450.

One who records an invalid tax title can be made defendant in ejectment even though no step has been taken to assert possession.

Heinmiller v. Hatheway, 60 Mich. 391. See also Anderson v. Courtwright, 47 Mich. 161; Hoyt v. Southard, 58 Mich. 434.

On the principle that the owner of the fee owns all above and below the surface, ejectment has been sustained for space above land covered by an overhanging roof (Tyler, Ejectment, 37; Aiken v. Benedict, 39 Barb. 400; Hoffman v. Armstrong, 48 N. Y. 201; McCourt v. Eckstein, 22 Wis. 155), and for a coal mine. Tyler, Ejectment, 41; Adams, Ejectment, 20; Caldwell v. Fulton, 31 Pa. 475, 72 Am. Dec. 760.

If mines and minerals are thus recoverable, why not the land occupied by this sewer, even separate and distinct from the outlet structure?

And defendant in lawful possession of the surface is liable in trespass for removal of coal below surface without right.

Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Japes (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 166.

And ejectment lies for veins and lodes beneath the surface (Sedgw. & W. Title to Lands, § 115-234; Caldwell v. Fulton, supra); and for entering upon the land below water. Sterling v. Jackson, 14 West. Rep. 229, 69 Mich. 488.

Ejectment lies in favor of the owner against one in possession and exercising acts in the nature of easement, as where a railroad company laid its track over one's land.

Carpenter v. Onwego & S. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 656.

And where a city claimed the right to swing a bridge crossing a canal, over the lands of plaintiff.

Lowe v. Kaukauna, 70 Wis. 306.

The contention that mere prevention of beneficial use of premises is not enough to warrant ejectment is answered by Judge Cooley's reasoning in Grand Rapids Boom Co. v. Jarvis, 30 Mich. 320.

Champlin, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff brought an action of ejectment against defendant by filing a declaration as commencement of suit, which contains two counts. The first count described the premises as follows: "A tract of land bounded on the northwest by Pine Grove Park, on the northeast by St. Clair River, and on the south by Lincoln Avenue, excepting a strip of land across said premises seventy-five feet in width, occupied by the Port Huron & Northwestern Railway Company, being fifty feet in width on the westerly side of the center line of the roadway of said company, and twenty-five feet on the easterly side thereof," which premises the plaintiff claimed in fee. The second count described the premises as follows: "All that part of that piece of land bounded on the northwest by Pine Grove Park, on the northeast by St. Clair River, and on the south by Lincoln Avenue, which is occupied by Superior-Street sewer and Ontario-Street sewer, and the outlet thereof;" and then the same exception as in the first count,—which premises the plaintiff claims in fee. A trial was had before a jury, and it appeared that this land described in the first count of plaintiff's declaration was formerly a part of the Ft. Gratiot military reservation; that on the 20th day of July, 1868, the Congress of the United States authorized the secretary of war to sell portions of this reservation, including the tract in controversy, "at such times as he may deem most advantageous to the interests of the government." On March 18, 1879, before any sales had been made by the secretary, a portion of the tract was granted to the City of Port Huron for park purposes, to be known as "Pine Grove Park." Some time during the season of 1870 the secretary of war caused the remaining portion of the reservation to be platted, and public sale was made of a part thereof. The part unsold, which is in controversy here, was sold under authority of an Act of Congress passed June 16, 1880, to the Port Huron & Northwestern Railway Company, and this company conveyed to the plaintiff in this suit such land by deed dated April 3, 1884. In this deed there was an erroneous description, which was corrected by a deed dated January 8, 1886. In June, 1874, the City of Port Huron, by its common council, decided to construct a sewer from the St. Clair River westward, through and along Park Place, to Ontario Street, and during that year entered upon the premises and constructed the sewer. The authorities of the United States had prepared a map previously to that time, on which was designated a street across the land described in the declaration as "Park Place," but before the same was recorded or the property sold the authorities of the United States had ignored such street, and retained the premises as property belonging to the government. In 1875 or 1876 the City caused a sewer to be built along Superior Street, which connected with the one through Park Place. These sewers have always been maintained by the City as public sewers, and continue so to be. They are used by the inhabitants of the City for sewage purposes, and, among others, by the plaintiff in this suit, who was, as appears, one of the petitioners for the construction of the sewer in Superior Street, which was built before he obtained title from the railway company. It further appears that at the outlet of the sewer, at its junction with the river, there is a structure of masonry several feet in height and twenty-two feet in width, extending outward from the bank into the stream, protected by a system of piling; and testimony was introduced tending to show that this structure prevents the land being used for any purposes requiring dockage, and that the land is so situated as to be valuable for a dock frontage. It was further shown upon the trial that the premises are uninclosed, and that there is nothing to prevent the plaintiff from taking possession peaceably of the lands described in his declaration. The sewer in question was built several years before the railway company made its purchase in 1880, and while the land belonged to the general government; and some effort was made on the part of the defendant to show that permission was given the City by the officer in charge of Ft. Gratiot for it to construct the sewer across these premises, but we think that such testimony wholly failed to show such permission. On the contrary, it was shown that, during the time they were excavating for the sewer, the officers in charge of the fort caused stakes to be set along the lines of this parcel of land to indicate that it belonged to the government.

It is a principle of law that where a person who, without the permission from the owner, knowingly enters upon his lands, and erects structures permanent in their character, annexed to the freehold, such structures belong to the owner of the soil to which they are annexed or upon which they are erected; and it follows that when the City erected this sewer across the lands of the government of the United States, without its consent or permission, such structure immediately belonged to the owner of the soil, and when the government conveyed such land to the railway company the whole of the premises passed to its grantee. The testimony does not show that the City is in possession of any of the premises described in plaintiff's declaration, or that it assumes to exercise any act of control or ownership over it; the facts appearing that in 1874 it constructed a sewer across it, which is the outlet of two sewers, and has done nothing since upon the lands. But if the City did claim to own the sewer, and have the right to discharge water through it, we do not think that the action of ejectment would lie, under the circumstances of this case. Ejectment will not lie in this State for anything that is not tangible or capable of being delivered to the plaintiff by the sheriff under the writ of possession. Here the judgment was rendered upon the verdict of the jury for the premises described in the first count of the plaintiff's declaration, such verdict having been directed by the trial court. A writ of possession, under such judgment, would only put the plaintiff in possession of what he could at any time have had without the aid of the court, and, when he was so put in possession of the land described in the first count of his declaration, the sewer would still incumber the land, and the water continue to be discharged through this artificial conduit. Ejectment will not lie for a mere trespass, nor for a mere right of way or an easement. Northern Turnp. Road Co. v. Smith, 15 Barb. 355; Judd v. Leonard, 1 D. Chip. (Vt.) 204; Clement v. Youngman, 40 Pa. 341; Caldwell v. Fulton, 31 Pa. 483; Child v. Chappell, 9 N. Y. 251.

If the corporation had obtained the right to construct the sewer across these lands to discharge the water passing therein, it would have created an easement upon the land. If the City constructed the sewer without authority, thus discharging the water upon and across the land, the act would be a trespass, but not an ouster of the plaintiff from the lands described. Expressed in simplest language, the City has constructed an artificial aqueduct across the lands belonging to plaintiff's grantor, through which it discharges water and sewage from two of the sewers laid in the streets of the City. There is no doubt that the plaintiff's title, as riparian owner, extends to the boundary line in the St. Clair River, and gives him the right to erect docks and employ the land for any purpose not inconsistent with the rights of navigation; and if the defendant in this case is in possession, and sets up a claim of right to maintain the sewer in the St. Clair River in front of his land, and to drive and maintain piles there for the purpose of protecting such sewer, we think ejectment would lie for the land so appropriated; but the facts in this case do not warrant this court in finding that the City of Port Huron has laid any claim to the right to maintain the structure which they erected when they built the sewer, and we are of opinion that the court erred in directing a verdict for plaintiff under the first count of plaintiff's declaration. The learned judge instructed the jury that "the act of the City in entering upon and excavating the soil for this sewer, and constructing the same, was such an act as amounted to an assertion or claim of title on its part, and so the owner of the property may treat it as an act of disseisin or ouster; and, as the sewer has been used and maintained continuously to the present time, I think it a legal fact that the plaintiff has been kept out of possession of the premises by the City." We have already called attention to the fact that this sewer was constructed long before the plaintiff obtained his title from the railway company, and in fact before the railway company had obtained its title to the land in dispute, and if there was any ouster of the owner, or an act of disseisin, it occurred a long time prior to the conveyance to plaintiff's grantor. The government, in conveying to plaintiff's grantor, only conveyed all the right, title, and interest of the United States to the land in question, without any covenants of warranty whatever. We shall not assume in this suit, at this time, to pass upon the question as to whether or not it was the intention of the government to recognize defendant's rights upon the premises; although it may be said that the government granted to the purchaser the full extent of its right, title, and interest in the premises. It is apparent, however, that whether the act of the City in constructing the sewer was a disseisin of the owner would depend very much upon the facts and circumstances under which the city entered upon the land and constructed the sewer. If at that time the City authorities supposed that there was a public street called "Park Place," in which they were constructing a sewer, it would not be such an assertion or claim of title on its part as would operate as a disseisin, if it afterwards turned out that the City was mistaken as to the claim under which it entered. Neither would it be a disseisin if the City entered by the consent, express or implied, of the owner. The mere fact that the sewer has been used continuously to the present time to discharge water into the St. Clair River, without any other acts or claims made by the defendant, would not amount in law to keeping the defendant out of possession of the premises. We think that the plaintiff has mistaken his remedy, and that the judgment must be reversed, and a new trial granted.

McGrath, Long, and Grant, JJ., concurred.

Morse, J., dissenting:

This judgment should be affirmed. The title of the premises in issue is indisputably in the plaintiff, and he is not in possession. The City of Port Huron is maintaining continuously from day to day and hour to hour a sewer upon his premises. The mouth of the sewer, where it empties into the St. Clair River, is constructed of stone, and protected by piles, constituting an obstruction to the erection of a dock, elevator, or building, and depriving plaintiff of all beneficial use of his water front. He has frequently applied to the municipal authorities in relation to this sewer, claiming it to be an obstruction to the exercise of his property rights in the land, and notified them that he was the owner of the premises; but they have always denied his title, and insisted on their right to maintain this sewer. It is true, under the authorities, that ejectment cannot be maintained for a mere trespass upon land, nor for a mere right of way or an easement; but that is not this case. This occupation of the city for the purpose of sewerage is not a mere temporary trespass, like one going onto the premises of another and doing damage and going away again, but it is a continuing trespass,—one that never ceases. The sewer remains there all the time, and is in use by the city night and day. It amounts substantially to a constant occupation of the plaintiff's premises, and a possession which is sufficient to justify the remedy of ejectment. Ejectment, under our Statute, will lie against any "person exercising acts of ownership on the premises claimed, or claiming title thereto, or some interest therein." How. Stat. § 7791.

fastened a boom-pole to piles driven in the Black River in front of plaintiff's land, and used the boom for the storage of logs, claiming the right to do so. It was held that ejectment could be maintained. There was nothing in that case to prevent the plaintiff from tearing away and removing this boom from his premises. He could have destroyed it, as he can destroy this sewer; but the law, in my opinion, does not force the plaintiff to destroy property to remove such an obstruction, or to get, as he probably would, into a war or conflict over the possession of the premises so occupied by another, in which conflict the superior force would prevail. He is entitled to the peaceful remedy of ejectment. Nor is he even compelled to resort to the inadequate and vexatious remedy of trespass,—a remedy which, in case of judgment in his favor, settles nothing as to his title to the land. Keyser v. Sutherland, 59 Mich. 455. But it is said that there has been and is nothing in the way of his taking peaceful possession of the land. But this is no valid reason why he cannot bring ejectment under our Statute. We have held repeatedly that the putting on the record of a tax deed to premises and claiming title thereunder would warrant an action of ejectment by the owner of the land out of possession against the holder of such tax title. Heinmiller v. Hatheway, 60 Mich. 391; Anderson v. Courtright, 47 Mich. 161; Hoyt v. Southard, 58 Mich. 434. Yet in such case there would be nothing to prevent the owner obtaining peaceable possession of the premises in most cases, but it has never been claimed that the fact that such possession could be taken had anything to do with the right to bring ejectment. Possession in the defendant is not a necessary element in ejectment in this State. The remedy is aimed against the assertion of ownership of or an interest in the land as well as against an unlawful possession. Nor are the cases cited by the chief justice in relation to easements or rights of way applicable here. The plaintiff is not bringing ejectment to recover a right of way or an easement, but to free his land of an unauthorized occupation under a claim of right by the city to so occupy it. As before shown, he is not obliged to invite trouble and conflict in an attempt to free his premises by removing the piles and tearing out the sewer. The action of trespass would not settle his title. He is not obliged to forbear his remedy in ejectment,—the only proper action to declare and fix his title permanently,—because the premises are not guarded against his peaceable entry upon them. In 24 N. Y. 656 (Carpenter v. Oswego & S. R. Co.), ejectment was brought against the defendant, and upheld, a majority of the court holding that the occupation was such that the action would lie. It was shown that the railway company had laid a track and affixed it to the soil, but had never used it or connected it with their operating road. They justified the laying of the track under permission of the municipal authorities, claiming the ground to be a public street; and also raised the point that ejectment would not lie because of the character of their occupancy. The court held that the fee of the soil, if it was a street, was in the plaintiff, and he had a right of action against any person using it for any other than legitimate street purposes, and that the defendant had sufficient occupancy to justify bringing ejectment. The court said: "Ejectment will lie for anything attached to the soil of which the sheriff can deliver possession." But it is said that a writ of possession under a judgment in favor of the plaintiff will only put him in possession of what he could at any time have had without the aid of the court, and that the sewer would still incumber the land. So also a writ in the case of Hoyt v. Southard, 58 Mich. 484, would only have given the plaintiff, as far as the possession was concerned, what he could also have taken without suit. But something more is accomplished by the writ in both cases than the mere delivery of the possession. The possession is delivered symbolically, but with it goes the establishment of plaintiff's title, freed from the adverse claim of title by the defendant. In the case at bar, also, the sewer with its stonework and piles is delivered to the plaintiff as his own, to do with them as he sees fit, without fear of further litigation, or any other conflict. In no other way except by an action of ejectment can the plaintiff determine and adjudicate at law his title to this land unless he shall do something which will authorize the City to bring ejectment against him; and it is very doubtful if he could do any act which would authorize the City to maintain ejectment against him under the authorities.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

F. ZABEL, Appt.,

v.

LOUISVILLE BAPTIST ORPHANS' HOME.

(.....Ky.....)

1. To plead a private statute under Civ. Code, § 119, subsec. 2, a party must at least state its title and the day on which it became a law.
2. A Baptist Orphans' Home is a charity, and as such renders a public service for which it may be lawfully exempted from taxation by the Legislature.
3. An exemption of a charitable institution from "all taxation" by state or local laws for any purpose whatever, does not extend to assessments for street improvements.
4. The power to fix the grade of a street cannot be delegated by a city council to a contractor.
5. A petition to enforce a lien for a street assessment is fatally defective if it fails to show that the city council and not the contractor fixed the grade of the street.

(October 6, 1891.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Louisville Chancery Court in favor of defendant in a proceeding instituted to enforce an assessment for street improvements. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Newton G. Rogers, for appellant:

Defendant is not a public corporation; is not in fact capable of providing a general public service. It is limited strictly by the provisions of its charter, and strictly by the very title of its charter, to a limited class of people. Such being the case, it cannot claim an exception from the general public burdens on the ground that it has or does perform acts of a public nature.

Com. v. Masonic Temple Co. 87 Ky. 849; Louisville v. Board of Trade (Ky.) 12 L. R. A. 629.

Even if it had performed or did perform acts of a public nature, so as to entitle it to be exempt from the payment of the ordinary taxes or revenue to the City of Louisville, or even to the State of Kentucky, it would not be exempt from the payment of a special tax or assessment like the one at bar.

Broadway Bapt. Church v. McAtee, 8 Bush, 508.

If the charter would exonerate it from the payment of taxes in general, then the act or the charter is invalid and unconstitutional.

Barbour v. Louisville Bd. of Trade, 82 Ky. 645.

Messrs. Oneal, Jackson & Phelps for appellee.

Holt, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant, F. Zabel, sues to enforce a lien against the property of the appellee, the Louisville Baptist Orphans' Home, for its proportion of the cost of constructing an alley abutting it, under a contract with the City of Louisville. The answer denies the averments of the petition, and in a second paragraph avers that it is a corporation conducted solely for charity, realizing no profit from its investments; and that its charter, which antedates the ordinance under which the improvement was made, in consideration of public services exempts its property from all taxation for any purpose. A demurrer to this paragraph was overruled, and, the plaintiff declining to plead further, the action was dismissed as to the appellee. The judgment, as copied into this record, does not expressly so order, but it overrules the demurrer, recites that the plaintiff declined to plead further, and, after excepting to the judgment, prayed an appeal to this court, which was granted, the case being retained for further proceedings against the other defendant, the City of Louisville.

With some hesitation we shall treat this as a final judgment as to the appellant, and therefore consider the appeal. The court evidently so intended it. The parties so regarded it, and have so treated it in argument in this court. Under the charter of the city, the proper avowment in a petition of all the steps leading to the creation of such a lien, when supported by such exhibits as were filed in this instance, creates, in the face of a mere denial, a prima facie case. Hence, if the petition was sufficient, and the defense set out in the second paragraph insufficient, the plaintiff was, in the absence of testimony, entitled to judgment. It is claimed, first, that if a good defense upon the score of exemption in fact existed, it was not sufficiently pleaded. The answer did not set forth the exemption statute in hæc verba, nor did it refer to it by stating its title and the time when it became a law. It is a private statute, and section 119, subsec. 2, of the Civil Code provides: "In pleading a private statute it shall be sufficient to refer to it by stating its title and the day on which it became a law." A party relying upon such a statute must at least state this much; and the plea was defective in this respect.

As the case must go back for another hearing, it is not improper to consider other objections to the plea. To do so will doubtless expedite the case. It is urged that the appellee renders no public service, and that therefore the Legislature could not constitutionally exempt it from taxation. It is, however, a charity, and as such renders a public service. Its very name indicates its object, and entitles it to privilege and gratitude. It is the duty of the State to care for its indigent orphans; and, if done by another, he renders what is properly a public service, and the Legislature may therefore, without regard to the extent of it, exempt the property devoted to such use from taxation. Examination shows, however, that the provision of the Statute intended to be relied upon reads thus: "The property, money, and estate and rights of said corporation shall be exempt from all taxation by state or local laws for any purpose whatever." Acts 1869-70, vol. 1, p. 181. While the language is broad, yet it really amounts to no more than saying that the appellee shall be exempt from all taxation. The word "tax" does not embrace a local assessment. Something more is needed, showing that such was the legislative intention. Such a purpose, inasmuch as it imposes an additional burden upon others, should appear with reasonable certainty. Exemptions are of grace. They are to be strictly construed, and can embrace only what is clearly within their terms. While the right to levy a local assessment—as, for instance, to pay for a street improvement in a town or city—is derived from the taxing power, yet it is a distinct character of taxation, not ordinarily included within the meaning of that term. It proceeds upon the ground of equivalent benefits, and that it is no burden to pay for the improvement of a street in the ratio of benefits received. It is said in Burroughs on Taxation (page 461): "The word 'tax' or 'taxes' does not include local assessments, unless there be something in the statute in which it is found to indicate such an intention. The question frequently arises in the construction of statutes exempting persons or corporations from the payment of 'taxes,' and the almost unbroken current of authority is that such expressions do not include local assessments. In the case cited from 46 Cal. 553 (Williams v. Corcoran), the defendant was 'exempted from taxation of every kind;' yet this was construed not to include a local assessment for the improvement of a street on which its real estate abutted. The language in the other cases cited is fully as strong. It is regarded as a distinct species of taxation, not included in the general term 'tax' and 'taxation.'" Another leading writer upon this subject says: "It has been shown in another place that, while these local assessments are laid under a taxing power, they are not taxes in the ordinary understanding of that term, and that consequently the usual exemptions from taxation will not preclude the property exempted being subjected to them." Cooley, Taxn. 2d ed. 650. The adjudged cases are in accord with these writers. Baltimore v. Green Mount Cemetery, 7 Md. 517; Bridgeport v. New York & N. H. R. Co. 36 Conn. 255; State v. Newark, 27 N. J. L. 185; Pater-son v. Society for Estab. U. Manuf. 24 N. J. L. 385. We have in this State a general statute exempting church property from taxation, but in the case of Broadway Baptist Church v. McAtee, 8 Bush, 508, it was held that such property in the City of Louisville was liable for its proper proportion of the cost of construction and reconstruction of streets. In that case the Statute was a general one, applying to all church property, while here it is a private one, relating only to the appellee; but this does not render a different rule of construction applicable. The principle is the same; and whether the exemption be by a general statute or by a special one, relating only to the party claiming the exemption, it must, in the absence of language importing otherwise, be held to relate only to taxation for the general purpose of state, county and municipal government. To say of property that it is "exempt from all taxation by state or local laws for any purpose whatever," certainly gives no greater exemption than to say that it is "exempted from taxation of every kind;" and in enacting the Statute in question the Legislature must be presumed to have known of the almost uniform construction that has been given to the word "taxation." This being so, had it been intended to exempt the property of the appellee from being liable for its proper proportion of the cost of a benefit, which, as must be presumed, is directly conferred upon it by the construction of the street, the Statute would have provided in express terms that it should be exempt from local assessments. Such an intention cannot fairly be inferred from the language used, and it must be presumed that the word "taxation" was employed in its legal sense.

It is said, however, that the petition is defective, in that it fails to aver or show by any of the exhibits filed as a part of it that the city council fixed what should be the grade of the street. This objection is well taken. The copy of the city ordinance filed with the petition refers to another one, but no copy of it is filed, nor are its provisions set forth in the petition. It may or it may not fix the grade of the improvement. No presumption that it does is admissible. The council could not abdicate its legislative power in this respect, and leaving the matter to the judgment, or, perhaps, whim, of the city engineer or the contractor, subject the property of the abutting owner to whatever the improvement might cost. This would leave him largely at the mercy of an irresponsible, and, perhaps, interested party. The city, by its charter, has power to improve its streets as may be prescribed by ordinance. The power is a legislative one, and the kind and character of the improvement must be fixed by the city council. Hydes v. Joyes, 4 Bush, 464.

While, therefore, the second paragraph of the answer was for the reasons indicated open to demurrer, yet it should have been carried back and sustained to the petition; and the judgment is reversed, with leave to the parties to amend the pleadings, and for further proceedings in conformity to this opinion.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

v.

Edward A. MARSTON.

(..... N. H.)

1. A tax collector is such while he retains his warrants and lists upon which are uncollected taxes, even after the expiration of his term, within the meaning of a statute prohibiting collectors of taxes from being members of the board of selectmen.
2. The acceptance of an office by one disqualified to hold it by reason of holding an incompatible office is not necessarily a resignation of the prior office in the absence of a special statutory or constitutional provision giving it that effect.
3. One cannot divest himself of the office of tax collector by resignation unless his resignation is accepted by competent authority.

4. One acquires no title to an office by being elected to it when he was disqualified by statute to hold it by reason of his holding an incompatible office.

PETITION for a writ of quo warranto to oust defendant from the office of selectman for the Town of Durham, heard in vacation before Doe, Ch. J., and adjourned by him to the law term. Judgment of ouster.

Defendant was elected to the office of tax collector for the years 1888, 1889, and 1890. He took the official oath and served for the designated terms. At the annual meeting in March, 1891, he was elected selectman and took the oath and assumed to exercise the duties of that office. This proceeding was instituted to try his title thereto.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

NOTE.—Tenure of public office; incompatibility of offices.

It is well settled that when a person accepts an office incompatible with one which he then holds, he thereby impliedly resigns or vacates his former office. State v. Buttz, 9 S. C. 156; State v. Brown, 5 R. I. 1; People v. Carrique, 2 Hill, 98; Magie v. Stoddard, 25 Conn. 566; People v. Nostrand, 48 N. Y. 375; Stubbs v. Lee, 64 Me. 196; People v. Hanifan, 98 Ill. 420.

In cases where the question of incompatibility of offices has arisen, independently of statutory or constitutional provision, two rules are generally recognized: (1) that incompatibility does not depend upon the incidents of the offices, as upon physical inability to be engaged in the duties of both at the same time; (2) the character and relation of the offices. State v. Goff, 4 New Eng. Rep. 100, 15 R. I. 506.

In People v. Green, 5 Daly, 254, it was held that the office of member of the Legislature and clerk of the court of special sessions might be held by the same person, even though attendance upon one office prevented for the time being the performance of the duties of the other. This point was approved on appeal. People v. Green, 68 N. Y. 295.

In Com. v. Kirby, 2 Cush. 577, 680, the court says: "It has never been supposed that persons holding minor offices appertaining to the executive department of the government, such as deputy sheriffs, constables, or coroners, were thereby disqualified from holding seats in the Legislature. The same was formerly true of the judges of the court of common pleas, who frequently held the office of senator or representative while in commission as judges.

The test of incompatibility under the second rule is the character and relation of the officers; as where one is subordinate to the other, and subject in some degree to its revisory power; or where the functions of the two officers are inherently inconsistent and repugnant. In such cases it has uniformly been held that the same person cannot hold both offices. State v. Goff, 4 New Eng. Rep. 100, 15 R. I. 506.

formly been held that the same person cannot hold both offices. State v. Goff, 4 New Eng. Rep. 100, 15 R. I. 506.

In Cotton v. Phillips, 56 N. H. 220, where one was chosen a member of the prudential committee and also an auditor in a school district, it was held he could not hold both offices. The court says: "If the same person could hold both offices, he would in fact sit in judgment on his own acts."

Incompatibility arises where the functions of the two offices are inconsistent with their being exercised by the same person: such as being judge and clerk of the same court; the officer who presents his accounts for audit and the officer who passes upon it; judge and deputy sheriff (People v. Green, 68 N. Y. 295; State v. Goff, 4 New Eng. Rep. 100, 15 R. I. 506, 2 Am. St. Rep. 921); governor of a State and member of its Legislature; justice of the peace and judge of the appellate court (Barnum v. Gilpin, 27 Minn. 468, 38 Am. Rep. 304; Mohan v. Jackson, 52 Ind. 599; Com. v. Bins, 17 Serg. & R. 221; State v. Feibleman, 28 Ark. 424); sheriff and justice of the peace. Stubbs v. Lee, 64 Me. 196, 18 Am. Rep. 251; Wilson v. King, 3 Litt. 457, 14 Am. Dec. 84; State Bank v. Curran, 10 Ark. 142; Lawson, Rights, Remedies & Practice, § 3804.

When a person is selected for office who has not the qualifications required by law, the selection is not therefore void. The person selected is de facto an officer; his acts in the discharge of his duties are valid and binding. The peace and repose of society imperiously require that his official acts, so far as others are concerned, should be valid. This is true of the highest and lowest officers from the governor to the constable. St. Louis County Ct. v. Sparks, 10 Mo. 117, 45 Am. Dec. 365.

Messrs. J. G. Hall and John Kivel for plaintiff.

Messrs. Frink & Batchelder, for defendant:

There is no incompatibility between the office of collector of taxes and selectman, save the statutory one.

Pittsburg v. Danforth, 56 N. H. 274.

The Statute does not prohibit a collector, chosen or appointed for a prior year, but who has not collected all the taxes on his list, from being elected, and discharging the duties of selectman.

Gen. Laws, chap. 49, § 5, provides that neither the treasurer nor the collector of taxes shall be a member of the board of selectmen.

The Statute recognizes but one officer, existing at any one time, as the collector of taxes.

The reason of the law does not extend to ex-collectors. The law itself intends that the collector shall collect all his taxes within the year and settle his account.

Northumberland v. Cobleigh, 59 N. H. 254.

After that he is only a debtor to the town for the amount of the uncollected taxes. He cannot act upon their abatement if he is a selectman.

Pittsburg v. Danforth, supra.

By his acceptance of the office of selectman, defendant must be regarded as having resigned his office as collector of taxes.

Cotton v. Phillips, 56 N. H. 220.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

"Neither the treasurer nor collector of taxes shall be a member of the board of selectmen." Gen. Laws, chap. 40, § 5. The duties of the offices of collector and selectmen are in some respects conflicting. The collector is required to give a bond to the acceptance of the town or selectmen. Id. chap. 42, § 4. The selectmen may remove a collector for certain causes (Id. chap. 42, § 9); and in certain cases they have power to issue an extent against him (Id.

chap. 66, § 5). And it is the duty of the selectmen, acting in behalf of the town, to see that the collector faithfully performs his official duties, and in default to take measures to protect the interests of the town. The defendant having been elected and having served as collector for the years 1888, 1889, and 1890 and still retaining his warrants and lists upon which are uncollected taxes, is still collector for those years. "Every collector, in the collection of taxes committed to him to collect, and in the service of his warrant, shall have the powers vested in constables in the service of civil process, which shall continue until all taxes in his list are collected." Id. chap. 58, § 1.

The defendant's acceptance of the office of selectman did not relieve him of the office of collector. The acceptance of an office by one disqualified to hold it by reason of holding an incompatible office is not necessarily a resignation of the prior office, unless it is made so by special statutory or constitutional provision. Const. pt. 2, arts. 94, 95. The defendant's resignation would not divest him of the office of collector unless it was accepted. Gen. Laws, chap. 42, § 1, provides that in case any officer who has given an official bond shall resign, he and his sureties shall continue liable upon his bond for all acts under color of his office until he shall resign and his resignation shall have been accepted by the town, selectmen, or others competent to accept the same.

The defendant being a collector of taxes for the Town of Durham when he was elected a selectman, was disqualified to hold the office, and his election gives him no title to it. Cotton v. Phillips, 56 N. H. 220, 223. Having assumed the office of selectman under color of an election, Marston is an officer de facto, and his official acts are valid as to third persons.

Judgment of ouster.

Doe, Ch. J., did not sit. The others concurred.

Condon elected not to build the wall,

NOTE.—Contract; liquidated damages and penalty distinguished.

Whether an amount stated in a contract is to be regarded as a "penalty" or as "liquidated damages" is frequently a matter of great difficulty to determine, especially as the question is not controlled or indeed affected by the employment of either or both these terms. *Dwinel v. The cost of removing the house, and putting it in as good condition as it was before, would not have exceeded $100. Held, that when the parties made the contract, and stipulated for damages in case of breach, fixing the amount at $500, they could not have had in contemplation actual, compensatory damages; and therefore,—Held, that the sum of $500 mentioned in such contract as liquidated and ascertained damages must be treated as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages.

ERROR to the District Court for Labette County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the sum of $500 as liquidated damages for the breach of a contract. Reversed.

Statement by Valentine, J.:

This was an action brought in the District Court of Labette County by L. H. Kemper against C. M. Condon to recover $500 as liquidated damages for the alleged breach of the following written contract, to wit:

Even where the parties expressly stipulate in the recitals of the contract that the sum mentioned shall be regarded as liquidated and ascertained damages, and not as a "penalty," or where any other language equally conclusive had been used, the courts will still construe the recitals as in the nature of a contract, and restrict the measure of damages to such as the evidence shows have been actually received. Kemble v. Farren, 6 Bing. 141; Dennis v. Cummins, 3 Johns. Cas. 297; Jackson v. Baker, 2 Edw. Ch. 471, 6 L. ed. 470; Reindell v. Scheil, 4 C. B. N. S. 97; Curry v. Larer, 7 Pa. 470; Baird v. Tolliver, 6 Humph. 186; Moore v. Platte Co. 8 Mo. 437; Shreve v. Brereton, 51 Pa. 175; Re Newman, L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 724; Boys v. Ancell, 5 Bing. N. C. 390; Horne v. Flintoff, 9 Mees. & W. 678; Lawson, Rights, Remedies & Practice, § 2643.

The question is held to depend upon the meaning and intent of the parties as gathered from a full view of the provisions of the contract, the terms used to express such intent, and the peculiar circumstances of the subject matter of the agreement. Dakin v. Williams, 17 Wend. 447, affirmed, 22 Wend. 201; Shute v. Hamilton, 3 Daly, 462; Perkins v. Lyman, 11 Mass. 78; Streep v. Williams, 48 Pa. 450; Chase v. Allen, 13 Gray, 42.

The contractual agreement of the parties must control, and the true inquiry is, What was the undertaking? Whether it was advantageous or otherwise for the contracting parties to make this particular contract, is immaterial, if the intent is clear. Bagley v. Peddie, 16 N. Y. 466; Hosmer v. True, 19 Barb. 106; Cushing v. Drew, 97 Mass. 445.

So the use of the word "penalty," or the term "liquidated damages," does not conclusively show this intention, if the entire agreement indicates a different view. Chamberlain v. Bagley, 11 N. H. 284; Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moore, P. C. 199; Davis v. Penton, 6 Barn. & C. 216; Davis v. Freeman, 10 Mich. 188.

The rule established by the principal case is further illustrated by the following decisions: Baye v. Ambrose, 28 Mo. 39; Clark v. Kay, 26 Ga. 403; Daily v. Litchfield, 10 Mich. 29; Gower v. Saltmarsh, 11 Mo. 271; Nash v. Hermosilla, 9 Cal. 584; Halderman v. Jennings, 14 Ark. 329; Foley v. McKeegan, 4 Iowa, 1; Baird v. Tolliver, 6 Humph. 186; *Wilson v. 13 L. R. A.

"This agreement between L. H. Kemper and C. M. Condon witnesseth, that whereas, the said Kemper has sold to said Condon lot 7, block 38, in Oswego, Kansas, said Condon, as a part of the consideration therefor, agrees to erect thereon a two-story stone or brick building, not less than 100 feet deep, within six months, and to give use of the north wall thereof to said Kemper; or else remove the house now on lot 6, in said block 38, three feet north of where it now stands, as said Condon shall elect to do, and put said building in as good condition as it is in its present location. It is mutually agreed between said parties that a failure on the part of said Condon to perform these obligations shall entitle said Kemper to recover from him the sum of five hundred dollars as liquidated and ascertained damages for the breach of this contract. C. M. Condon, Oswego, Kansas, March 11, 1887." The defendant answered as follows: "Said defendant admits the execution and delivery of the writing marked 'Exhibit A,' attached to and made part of plaintiff's petition, but he alleges

A sum named in an agreement containing disconnected stipulations of various degrees of importance, will be considered as a penalty, though it is called in the agreement liquidated damages, unless the agreement specify the particular stipulation or stipulations to which the liquidated damages are to be confined. Astley v. Weldon, 2 Bos. & P. 346; Kemble v. Farren, 6 Bing. 141; Boys v. Ancell, 5 Bing. N. C. 390; Horne v. Flintoff, 9 Mees. & W. 678; Cheddick v. Marsh, 21 N. J. L. 463; Whitfield v. Levy, 35 N. J. L. 149.

If upon the face of the instrument it be doubtful whether the contracting parties intended that the sum specified in the agreement shall be a penalty or liquidated damages, the inclination of courts is to consider the contract as creating a penalty to cover the damages actually sustained by a breach of the contract, and not liquidated damages. Crisdee v. Bolton, 2 Carr. & P. 240; Taylor v. Sandford, 20 U. S. 7; Wheat, 13, 5 L. ed. 384; Chilliner v. Chilliner, 2 Ves. Sr. 528; Shute v. Taylor, 5 Met. 61; Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moore, P. C. 199; Coles v. Sims, 5 De G. M. & G. 1; Hahn v. Horstman, 12 Bush, 249; Yenner v. Hammond, 36 Wis. 277; Streep v. Williams, 48 Pa. 450; Lynde v. Thompson, 2 Allen, 456; Wallis v. Carpenter, 13 Allen, 19; Green v. Price, 13 Mees. & W. 701; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 440.

The tendency of late years has been to regard the statements of the contracting parties as to liquidated damages in the light of a penalty; and unless the contrary intention is unequivocally expressed, harsh provisions will be avoided, and compensation in the way of a penalty will be decreed. Gammon v. Howe, 14 Me. 250; Richards v. Edick, 17 Barb. 260; Leggett v. New York Mut. L. Ins. Co. 53 N. Y. 304; Bright v. Rowland, 3 How. (Miss.) 398; Hamilton v. Overton, 6 Blackf. 206; Hoag v. McGinnis, 22 Wend. 163; Brown v. Bellows, 4 Pick. 179; Baird v. Tolliver, 6 Humph. 186; Wallace v. Carpenter, supra; Watts v. Sheppard, 2 Ala. 425; Hodges v. King, 7 Met. 583; Owens v. Hodges, 1 McMull. L. 106; Moore v. Platte Co. 8 Mo. 467.

The tendency and preference of the law is to regard a sum stated to be payable if a contract is not fulfilled as a penalty and not as liquidated damages. Yet courts endeavor to learn, from the subject matter of the contract, the nature of the stipulations, and the surrounding circumstances, what was the real intent of the parties, and are governed by such intent. Cushing v. Drew, 97 Mass. 445.

the fact to be that said writing was executed and delivered under a misapprehension and a mistake of the facts in reference to the subject matter of the transaction therein referred to as they actually existed, and that but for such mistake such writing would not have been executed. Defendant alleges that plaintiff was the owner of lots 6 and 7, in block 38, in the City of Oswego, Kansas. That the frame house mentioned in said writing belonged to plaintiff, and was appurtenant to said lot 6. That defendant negotiated for and purchased from plaintiff said lot 7 with a view of erecting thereon a stone or brick building. That at the time of purchasing said lot 7, and of executing and delivering said writing, both plaintiff and defendant understood and believed that said frame house, mentioned in said writing, and which belonged on and was appurtenant to said lot 6, stood on the line between said lots 6 and 7; the main part of it being, as said parties supposed, on lot 6, and about two or three feet in width of it standing on said lot 7. That to permit defendant to build on his said lot 7 would necessitate the removal of said house, as said parties believed, some three feet to the north. That plaintiff sold, and defendant bought, said lot under such belief. That plaintiff, in negotiating for the sale of said lot 7, objected to being put to the expense of removing said house so that it would all stand on his own lot 6, or insisted, if he were put to such expense, he should be compensated therefor: and to this defendant assented, and agreed that he would, at his own expense, remove said frame house so that it should entirely stand on said lot 6, and far enough across the line between said lots 6 and 7 not to interfere with the erection of a wall on said line, and put it in as good condition as it then was, where it then stood; or if he should so elect, instead of removing and repairing said house as aforesaid, he might erect on said lot 7 a brick or stone building not less than 100 feet deep, and give plaintiff the use of the north wall thereof as compensation for his moving and repairing said house as aforesaid. That it was to meet such contingency, and secure such end, that said writing was executed and delivered. That thereafter this defendant elected not to erect said stone or brick building on said lot 7, and not to furnish plaintiff the use of the north wall thereof. That, by agreement between said plaintiff and defendant, said block was afterwards surveyed, and the fact was then ascertained that said frame building did not stand, as both of said parties had supposed it did, across the line between said lots 6 and 7,—a part on 6 and a part on 7,—but that it all then stood on said lot 6, and so far from the line between lots 6 and 7 as not to interfere with the erection of a wall thereon, and therefore a removal of said frame building was unnecessary, and would be of no advantage whatever to plaintiff. Defendant alleges that the only purpose on the part of plaintiff or defendant in the execution and delivery of said writing was to indemnify plaintiff against cost and expense in the removal and repair of said house as aforesaid.

and that, had plaintiff desired its removal after the fact in reference to its true location was ascertained, he could have had it removed three feet north of where it then stood, and put in as good condition as it was, where it then stood, at a cost and expense of not to exceed $100. That said house could, at the time of the execution of said writing, or at any time since then, have been removed three feet north of where it then stood and now stands, and put in as good condition as it then was, in its then location, at a cost of not to exceed $100. That in no event could plaintiff's damage, had he desired to have had said house removed, exceed one hundred dollars. That to indemnify against such possible damage was the only object in giving said writing. Defendant alleges that plaintiff has not removed said house, and has in no way been to any cost or expense on account of the removal of said house, or for any other purpose referred to in any way in said writing. Defendant denies that plaintiff has suffered any damage on his account, and denies any liability to him in any respect. Wherefore defendant asks that this cause be dismissed, and that he recover his costs herein." The plaintiff replied, denying every allegation of the answer inconsistent with the allegations of his petition. When the case was called for trial, the plaintiff moved for judgment upon the pleadings; and the court sustained the motion, and rendered judgment accordingly in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for $500, with interest and costs; and the defendant excepted, and afterwards, as plaintiff in error, brought the case to this court for review.

Messrs. Case & Glasse, for plaintiff in error:

The tendency of courts is to hold a sum named as a penalty rather than liquidated damages, when such a construction is at all compatible with the language used and the conditions of the contract entered into. Notwithstanding the language used, they will not find the intention to have been to consider a sum named as liquidated damage when it is to secure the performance of several items of unequal value or importance, the value of which can be accurately determined; and especially will they so hold when the sum named is greatly disproportioned to the damage which may be sustained.

Kemble v. Farren, 6 Bing. 141; 8 Parsons, Cont. pp. 157-159; Wood's Mayne, Dam. p. 212, §§ 172, 173, p. 213, §§ 168, 169, pp. 209, 210; Sedgw. Dam. p. 339; *Spencer v. Mr. J. H. Morrison for defendant in error.

Valentine, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The substantial question involved in this controversy is whether the plaintiff below, L. H. Kemper, may recover from the defendant below, C. M. Condon, the sum of $500 as agreed and liquidated damages, or whether he can recover only the amount of his actual loss or damage resulting from the breach of the contract sued on, which amount, according to the facts of the case as presented to us, cannot exceed $100. The contract upon which Kemper seeks to recover contains the following among other stipulations: "It is mutually agreed between said parties that a failure on the part of said Condon to perform these obligations shall entitle said Kemper to recover from him the sum of $500 as liquidated and ascertained damages for the breach of this contract." It will be seen that the parties themselves have used the words "liquidated and ascertained damages;" but nearly all the authorities agree that neither these words, nor any other words of similar import, are conclusive, but that the amount named, notwithstanding the use of such words, may nevertheless be nothing more than a penalty. Some of such authorities are the following: Lampman v. Cochran, 16 N. Y. 275; Ayers v. Peas, 12 Wend. 393; Hoag v. McGinnis, 22 Wend. 163; Beale v. Hayes, 5 Sandf. 640; Gray v. Crosby, 18 Johns. 219; Jackson v. Baker, 2 Edw. Ch. 471, 6 L. ed. 470; Shreve v. Brereton, 51 Pa. 175; Fitzpatrick v. Cottingham, 14 Wis. 219; Fisk v. Gray, 11 Allen, 132; Wallis v. Carpenter, 13 Allen, 19; Ex parte Pollard, 2 Low. 411; Baye v. Ambrose, 28 Mo. 39; Carter v. Strom, 41 Minn. 522; Schrumpf v. Tennessee Mfg. Co. 86 Tenn. 219; Haldeman v. Jennings, 14 Ark. 329; Davis v. Freeman, 10 Mich. 188; Hahn v. Horstman, 12 Bush, 249; Low v. Nolte, 16 Ill. 475; Kemble v. Farren, 6 Bing. 141; Davies v. Penton, 6 Barn. & C. 216; Horner v. Flintoff, 9 Mees. & W. 678; Newman v. Capper, L. R. 4 Ch. Div. 724.

Of course the words of the parties with respect to damages, losses, penalties, forfeitures, or any sum of money to be paid, received, or recovered, must be given due consideration, and, in the absence of anything to the contrary, must be held to have controlling force; but when it may be seen from the entire contract, and the circumstances under which the contract was made, that the parties did not have in contemplation actual damages or actual compensation, and did not attempt to stipulate with reference to the payment or recovery of actual damages or actual compensation, then the amount stipulated to be paid on the one side, or to be received or recovered on the other side, cannot be considered as liquidated damages, but must be considered in the nature of a penalty; and this, even if the parties should name such amount "liquidated damages."

The following text-books upon this subject may be examined with much profit: 1 Sedgw. Dam. 8th ed. chap. 12, §§ 389-427; 1 Sutherland, Dam. pp. 476-580, chap. 7, § 6; 13 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 857-868; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 440-447; 3 Parsons, Cont. pp. 156-163, § 2.

The text-books upon this subject unite in saying that the tendency and preference of the law is to regard a stated sum as a penalty, instead of liquidated damages, because actual damages can then be recovered, and the recovery be limited to such damages. 1 Sutherland, Dam. 490; 13 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 853, 860. The decisions of this court are also in this same line. The only decisions of this court upon the subject of liquidated damages are the following: Kurte v. Sporable, 6 Kan. 395; Foote v. Sprague, 13 Kan. 155; St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Shoemaker, 27 Kan. 677; Heatwole v. Gorrell, 35 Kan. 692.

We are satisfied with the foregoing decisions of this court, but they do not go to the extent of controlling the decision in the present case. The last case cited is supported by the following additional cases: Davis v. Gillett, 52 N. H. 126; Carroll v. Johnson, 58 Me. 164; Burrill v. Daggett, 77 Me. 545.

In 1 Sedgwick on Damages, 8th ed., the following among other language is used: "From the foregoing we derive the following as a general rule governing the whole subject: Whenever the damages were evidently the subject of calculation and adjustment between the parties, and a certain sum was agreed upon and intended as compensation, and is in fact reasonable in amount, it will be allowed by the court as liquidated damages." Section 405. "And here we are brought back by a somewhat circuitous path to the great fundamental principle which underlies our whole system,—that of compensation. The great object of this system is to place the plaintiff in as good a position as he would have had if his contract had not been broken. So long as parties themselves keep this principle in view, they will be allowed to agree upon such a sum as will probably be a fair equivalent of a breach of contract. But when they go beyond this, and undertake to stipulate, not for compensation, but for a sum out of all proportion to the measure of liability which the law regards as compensatory, then the law will not allow the agreement to stand. In all agreements, therefore, fixing upon a sum in advance as the measure or limit of liability, the final question is whether the subject of the contract is such that it violates this fundamental rule of compensation. If it does so, the sum fixed is necessarily a penalty. If it does not do so, the question arises, as in any other contract, as to what agreement the parties have actually made; and here, as in all other cases, their intention, as ascertained from the language employed, is a guide." Section 406. "Where the stipulated sum is wholly collateral to the object of the contract, being evidently inserted merely as security for performance, it will not be allowed as liquidated damages." Section 410. "Whenever an amount stipulated is to be paid on the non-payment of a less amount, or on default in delivering a thing of less value, the sum will generally be treated as a penalty." Section 411. "Whenever the stipulated sum is to be paid on breach of a contract of such a nature that the loss may be much greater or much less than the sum, it will not be allowed as liquidated damages." Section 412. "A sum fixed as security for the performance of a contract containing a number of stipulations of widely different importance, breaches of some of which are capable of accurate valuation, for any of which the stipulated sum is an excessive compensation, is a penalty." Section 413. "If the contract is one in which the measure of damages for part performance is ascertainable, and a sum is stipulated for breach of it, this sum will not be allowed as liquidated damages, in case of a partial breach." Section 415.

In 1 Pomeroy on Equity Jurisprudence the following language is used: "Where an agreement contains provisions for the performance or non-performance of several acts of different degrees of importance, and then a certain sum is stipulated to be paid upon a violation of any or all of such provisions, and the sum will be in some instances too large, and in others too small, a compensation for the injury thereby occasioned, that sum is to be treated as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages. This rule has been laid down in a somewhat different form, as follows: Where the agreement contains provisions for the performance or non-performance of acts which are not measurable by any exact pecuniary standard, and also of one or more other acts in respect of which the damages are easily ascertainable by a jury, and a certain sum is stipulated to be paid upon a violation of any or all of these provisions, such sum must be taken to be a penalty." Section 443. "Whether an agreement provides for the performance or non-performance of one single act, or of several distinct and separate acts, if the stipulation to pay a certain sum of money upon a default is so framed, is of such a nature and effect that it necessarily renders the defaulting party liable in the same amount at all events, both when his failure to perform is complete and when it is only partial, the sum must be regarded as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages." Section 444.

In Sutherland on Damages the following among other language is used: "While no one can fail to discover a very great amount of apparent conflict, still it will be found on examination that most of the cases, however conflicting in appearance, have yet been decided according to the justice and equity of the particular case." Page 478. "To be potential and controlling that a stated sum is liquidated damage, that sum must be fixed as the basis of compensation, and substantially limited to it; for just compensation is recognized as the universal measure of damages not punitive. Parties may liquidate the amount by previous agreement. But, when a stipulated sum is evidently not based on that principle, the intention to liquidate damages will either be found not to exist, or will be disregarded, and the stated sum treated as a penalty. Contracts are not made to be broken; and hence, when parties provide for consequences of a breach, they proceed with less caution than if that event was certain, and they were fixing a sum absolutely to be paid. The intention in all such cases is material; but, to prevent a stated sum from being treated as a penalty, the intention should be apparent to liquidate damages in the sense of making just compensation. It is not enough that the parties express the intention that the stated sum shall be paid in case of a violation of the contract. A penalty is not converted into liquidated damages by the intention that it be paid. It is intrinsically a different thing, and the intention that it be paid cannot alter its nature. A bond, literally construed, imports an intention that the penalty shall be paid if there be default in the performance of the condition; and formerly that was the legal effect. Courts of law now, however, administer the same equity to relieve from penalties in other forms of contract as from those in bonds. The evidence of an intention to measure the damage, therefore, is seldom satisfactory when the amount stated varies materially from a just estimate of the actual loss finally sustained." Pages 480, 481. See also especially 3 Parsons, Cont. 6th ed. p. 156 et seq.

Many courts hold that the intention of the parties must govern, but say that if the damages stipulated to be paid, received, or recovered on the breach of the contract are out of proportion to the actual damages that might be sustained, then the parties could not in fact have intended liquidated damages, but merely a penalty, whatever their language might be. Other courts hold that it makes no difference what the intention of the parties might be; that the nature of the contract itself must govern, and if the amount stipulated to be paid, received, or recovered is out of all proportion to the actual damages that might be sustained, then such amount must be treated as a penalty, whatever may have been the intention of the parties; that in fact, and in the very nature of things, such amount would be a penalty, and could not be anything else; that the parties could not by misnaming the amount, and calling it liquidated damages, make it such. In this connection the following language of Judge Christianity, who delivered the opinion of the court in the case of Jaquith v. Hudson, 5 Mich. 123, 136, 137, is instructive: "Again, the attempt to place this question upon the intention of the parties, and to make this the governing consideration, necessarily implies that, if the intention to make the sum stipulated damages should clearly appear, the court would enforce the contract according to that intention. To test this, let it be asked whether, in such a case, if it were admitted that the parties actually intended the sum to be considered as stipulated damages, and not as a penalty, a court of law would enforce it for the amount stipulated. Clearly, they could not, without going back to the technical and long-exploded doctrine which gave the whole penalty of the bond, without reference to the damages actually sustained. They would thus be simply changing the names of things, and enforcing, under the name of stipulated damages, what in its own nature is but a penalty. The real question in this class of cases will be found to be, not what the parties intended, but whether the sum is in fact in the nature of a penalty; and this is to be determined by the magnitude of the sum, in connection with the subject matter, and not at all by the words or the understanding of the parties. The intention of the parties cannot alter it. While courts of law gave the penalty of the bond, the parties intended the payment of the penalty as much as they now intend the payment of stipulated damages. It must therefore, we think, be very obvious that the actual intention of the parties in this class of cases, and relating to this point, is wholly immaterial; and, though the courts have very generally professed to base their decisions upon the intention of the parties, that intention is not, and cannot be, made the real basis of these decisions. In endeavoring to reconcile their decisions with the actual intention of the parties, the courts have sometimes been compelled to use language wholly at war with any idea of interpretation, and to say 'that the parties must be considered as not meaning exactly what they say.' Horner v. Flintoff, 9 Mees. & W. 678, per Parke, B. May it not be said, with at least equal propriety, that the courts have sometimes said what they did not exactly mean." And in the case of Myer v. Hart, 40 Mich. 517, 528, the Supreme Court of Michigan held as follows: "Just compensation for the injury sustained is the principle at which the law aims, and the parties will not be permitted, by express stipulation, to set this principle aside."

books and the reported cases, but we think the foregoing is sufficient; and from the foregoing it certainly follows that the plaintiff below, Kemper, cannot "recover" "the sum of $500 as liquidated and ascertained damages for the breach of this contract," notwithstanding such is the language of the contract. If the defendant, Condon, had removed the building situated on lot 6 three feet north, and had then put the same in as good condition as it was before, he would have so completed his contract that not one cent of damage could be recovered from him; and to so remove such building, and to to put it in as good condition as it was before, would not have cost to exceed $100. But suppose that Condon had removed the building, and then have failed to put the same in as good condition as it was before: he would have committed a breach of the contract, but the actual damages might not have been $25. Then, should the plaintiff, Kemper, recover the said sum of $500? Or suppose that Condon had removed the house, and attempted to put it in as good condition as it was before, but had failed to repair a lock, or a small portion of the plastering, or a broken window, which repairing might not have cost $1; then, should Kemper have the right to recover the said sum of $500? All this shows that the parties did not have in contemplation the matter of actual compensatory damages when they stipulated that Kemper might recover $500 from Condon as liquidated and ascertained damages, in case of a breach of the contract, but shows that in fact, though not in words, they fixed the sum of $500 as a penalty to cover all or any damages which might result from a breach of the contract.

The judgment of the court below will be reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

All the Justices concur.

(.....Vt.....)

1. A mortgage by an administrator individually to himself as administrator to secure an indebtedness which he owes to the estate is invalid for want of contracting parties.

2. A mortgagor's placing the mortgage, which he has executed individually to himself as administrator, without recording it, in a receptacle used for keeping papers belonging to himself and the estate, where it is found after his death, is not a delivery; and its subsequent recordation, by his successor is ineffectual.

A PPEAL by complainant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Rutland County

NOTE.—Deed, essentials to validity of.

A deed must be signed, sealed, and acknowledged, and it is still inoperative for any purpose until it is actually or constructively delivered by the grantor, and accepted by the grantee. This element of delivery is the inseparable accompaniment of every conveyance, and it cannot be omitted without fatal effect. Jackson v. Dunlap, 1 Johns. Cas. 114; Goddard's Case, 2 Coke 4 b; Stiles v. Brown, 16 Vt. 563; Fisher v. Beckworth, 30 Wis. 55; Hulick v. Scovill, 9 Ill. 175; Younge v. Gullbeau, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 641, 18 L. ed. 233; Church v. Gilman, 13 L. R. A.

16 Wend. 656; Fairbanks v. Metcalf, 8 Mass. 230; Overman v. Kerr, 17 Iowa, 486; Johnson v. Farley, 45 N. H. 510; Cook v. Brown, 34 N. H. 476; Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 421; Fletcher v. Mansur, 5 Ind. 267.

Delivery includes a surrender and acceptance, and both are necessary to its completion. This must be the result of a contract, the meeting of two minds, the accord of two wills. The grantor must be willing and agree to deliver, and the grantee must be willing and consent to receive, and this accord of wills must be evinced in some way to show the unequivocal intention of both parties that the dismissing his bill filed to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George E. Lawrence, for complainant:

Meacham, as administrator, was an entirely separate person from Meacham individually.

While public policy does not permit him in his representative capacity to deal and contract with himself in his individual capacity, nevertheless such contracts are in the nature of voidable contracts rather than void. And whenever contracts so made result beneficially to the trust they may be enforced in favor of the trust—and the trustee himself cannot nullify them.

Boerum v. Schenck, 41 N. Y. 183; Woerner, Law of Administration, 700-702, 1086, 1087.

Delivery, appears to have been accomplished, since the deed was signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of attesting witnesses, and placed among the papers of the estate he intended to be benefited thereby.

Souzerby v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. 240, 1 L. ed. 126.

An administration stands in the place of the deceased, and cannot defend against this mortgage, unless Meacham himself could, supposing the same had, by reason of his removal, passed to another administrator during his lifetime.

Martin v. Martin, 1 Vt. 91.

Mr. J. C. Baker, for defendant:

Every contract necessarily involves two parties: one bound to perform the contract, and the other entitled to have it performed.

A party cannot contract with himself.

2 Chitty, Contracts, 1339.

Without delivery there is no mortgage.

1 Jones, Mortgages, § 84.

Delivery is an incident necessary to give effect to a mortgage, even as between the parties to it.

1 Jones, Mortgages, § 539; 3 Washburn, Real Property, 282; Stiles v. Brown, 16 Vt. 563; Doiwell v. Bliss, 58 Vt. 353.

The grantor must part with the control and custody of the mortgage permanently, with the intention of having it take effect as a mortgage. So long as he retains the control of the deed he retains the title conveyed by it.

Elmore v. Marks, 39 Vt. 538. See Orr v. Clark, 62 Vt. 136; McElroy v. Hiner, 133 Ill. 156.

This deed being found among Mr. Meacham's papers in his safe after his death, and there having been no delivery in his lifetime, no record made after that time can have any effect.

Walsh v. Vermont Mut. F. Ins. Co. 54 Vt. 351.

Tyler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The following facts are reported: Rollins S. Meacham, in his life-time, was administrator with the will annexed of the estate of Angeline W. Gorham, and became largely indebted to the estate for moneys that had come into his hands as such administrator. For the purpose of securing the estate for this indebtedness, on March 1, 1889, he made and executed a promissory note for $1,550, payable to himself as administrator on demand, and in like manner a mortgage of his home place, conditioned for the payment of the note. He never settled the estate, nor rendered any account to the probate court. He converted the assets into money, and appropriated it to his own use in his private business. At the time the note and mortgage were executed, and at his decease, he was indebted to the estate to the amount of $7,000, and was insolvent. His debts, besides what he owed the estate, amounted to about $9,000 and his assets to about $4,000. The note and mortgage were retained by him, and were found after his decease in his safe among other papers that belonged to the estate, and among certain deeds and mortgages of his own. He died November 17, 1889. His wife was the daughter of the testatrix, and is the only person interested in her estate. After Meacham's decease, the defendant, as his administrator, handed the note and mortgage to Burditt, after the latter's appointment as administrator upon the estate of Mrs. Gorham, and Burditt caused the mortgage to be recorded in the town clerk's office. The question is as to its validity.

The mortgage must be held invalid for want of contracting parties. A contract necessarily implies a concurrence of intention in two parties, one of whom promises something to the other, who, on his part accepts such promise. One person cannot by his promise confer a right against himself until the person to whom the promise is made has accepted the same. Until the concurrence of the two minds, there is no contract; there is merely an offer which the promisor may at any time retract. Chitty, Cont. 9, quoting Pothier Obl.

It is essential to the validity of a deed that there be proper parties,—a person able to contract, and a person able to be contracted with. 3 Washb. Real Prop. 217.

To uphold this mortgage, we must say that there may be two distinct persons in one; for in law the mortgagor and mortgagee are identical. The addition of the words "executor of A. W. Gorham's estate" does not change the legal effect of the grant, which is to Meacham in his individual capacity. In 3 Washb. Real instrument shall take effect according to its purport and tenor. Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 416; Brackett v. Barney, 28 N. Y. 333; Best v. Brown, 25, Hun, 223.

It is a legal presumption that where a conveyance is found in the possession of the grantee or mortgagee, a due delivery of the instrument was intended. Green v. Yarnall, 6 Mo. 326; Clarke v. Ray, 1 Harr. & J. 319; Chandler v. Temple, 4 Cusb. 235; Southern L. Ins. & T. Co. v. Cole, 4 Fla. 359; Ward v. Lewis, 4 Pick. 518; Canning v. Pinkham, 1 N. H. 353; Houston v. Stanton, 11 Ala. 412; Cutts v. York Mfg. Co. 18 Me. 190; Ward v. Ross, 1 Stew. (Ala.) 136.

But this presumption may be rebutted by evidentiary facts calculated to prove the reverse of the conclusions established by the presumption. Williams v. Sullivan, 10 Rich. Eq. 217; Morris v. Henderson, 37 Miss. 501; Johnson v. Baker, 4 Barn. & Ald. 440; Wolverton v. Collins, 34 Iowa. 238; Adams v. Frye, 3 Met. 109; Ford v. James, 2 Abb. App. Dec. 162; Little v. Gibson, 30 N. M. 506; Roberts v. Jackson, 1 Wend. 478; Black v. Shreve, 13 N. J. Eq. 457; Black v. Lamb, 12 N. J. Eq. 118; Den v. Farlee, 21 N. J. L. 279. See notes to Standiford v. Standiford (Mo.) 3 L. R. A. 290; Stokes v. Anderson (Ind.) 4 L. R. A. 313; Taylor v. Street (Ga.) 5 L. R. A. 121.

Prop. 279, it is said that a grant to A., B., and C., trustees of a society named, their heirs, etc., is a grant to them individually; and Austin v. Shaw, 10 Allen, 552; Tovar v. Hale, 46 Barb. 361; Broton v. Combs, 29 N. J. L. 36,—are cited. In this case the grant and the habendum are not to the estate and its legal representatives, but to Meacham, executor, his heirs and assigns. Meacham had misappropriated the funds of the estate, and no one but himself assented to his giving a note and mortgage for the purpose of partially covering his default.

2. The mortgage was not delivered. An actual manual delivery of a deed or mortgage is not necessary. If it had been so disposed of as to evince clearly the intention of the parties that it should take effect as a conveyance, it is a sufficient delivery. Orr v. Clark, 32 Vt. 136. Whether it has been so disposed of or not depends upon the facts of a given case.

In Elmore v. Marks, 39 Vt. 538, the orator was indebted to Marks, and for the purpose of security made and executed to him a deed of certain land, and carried it to the town clerk's office to be filed, but not recorded, and to be returned to him when his indebtedness to Marks should be paid. Through inadvertence, the deed was recorded, and the orator took it into his possession. It was never delivered to Marks, and he had no knowledge of it until several months after it was recorded, when the orator told him that it had been recorded by mistake. It was held that there was no delivery. Pierpoint, Ch. J., said: "All the authorities seem to agree that, to constitute a delivery, the grantor must part with the custody and control of the instrument permanently, with the intention of having it take effect as a transfer of the title, and must part with his right to the instrument, as well as with the possession. So long as he retains the control of the deed, he retains the title." Anything which clearly manifests the intention of the grantor and the person to whom it is delivered that the deed should presently become operative and effectual, that the grantor loses all control over it, and that by it the grantee is to become possessed of the estate, constitutes a delivery. Byars v. Spencer, 101 Ill. 429.

In Stone v. French, 37 Kan. 145, it appeared that Francis B. French formed an intention of giving a certain piece of land to his brother, unless he should dispose of it during his lifetime. Accordingly, he wrote a letter to his brother in which he stated that in case of his decease his brother should have the land, and do with it as he pleased; that he would make a deed of it, inclose it in an envelope, and direct it to him to be mailed in event of the grantor's death. The grantor afterwards made a deed which contained the usual words, "Signed, sealed, and delivered in the presence of," etc. It was in all respects properly executed, and was placed in an envelope in the grantor's table drawer, with directions indorsed upon the envelope to have the deed recorded, but it was in fact never delivered. It was held that there was no delivery of the deed, and that the title to the land did not pass to the grantee; that, the deed being void, the recording of it after the grantor's death gave it no validity. A mere intention to convey a title is not sufficient. 18 L. R. A.

The intention and the act of delivery of the deed are both essential. To constitute a complete delivery of a deed, the grantor must do some act putting it beyond his power to revoke. Phill. Ev. (2 Cow. & H. notes, 5th ed.) 660, and authorities collated.

In Younge v. Guilbeau, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 636, 18 L. ed. 262, it is said that "the delivery of a deed is essential to the transfer of a title. It is the final act, without which all other formalities are ineffectual. To constitute such delivery, the grantor must part with the possession of the deed or the right to retain it."

In Fisher v. Hall, 41 N. Y. 416, the court of appeals said: "A rule of law by which a voluntary deed executed by the grantor, afterwards retained by him during his life in his own exclusive possession and control, never during that time made known to the grantee, and never delivered to anyone for him, or declared by the grantor to be intended as a present operative conveyance, could be permitted to take effect as a transmission of the title, is so inconsistent with every substantial right of property as to deserve no toleration whatever from any intelligent court, either of law or equity." Without a delivery and acceptance, there is no mortgage, but only an attempt at one, or a proposition to make one. 1 Jones, Mort. § 104; Jewett v. Preston, 27 Me. 400; Foster v. Perkins, 42 Me. 168; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 299.

The fact that the note and mortgage, duly executed by Meacham, were found after his decease among his papers and papers of the estate, shows no delivery of them in any legal sense; on the contrary, the facts that he omitted to have the mortgage recorded, that he retained it in his possession and under his control so long a time, and that it ran to him and his heirs and assigns, indicate that he never decided to give it legal effect. He did not make it operative in his lifetime, or direct that it should take effect at his death, which was necessary to give it a testamentary character. The act of recording it after that event could not give it validity.

Decree affirmed, and cause remanded.

Representations privately made in regard to property which has been ad-

NOTE.—Warranty, before or after sale.

Before sale.

A warranty shortly before the time of a sale, if relied upon, is binding. Wilnot v. Hurd, 11 Wend. 584; Lisney v. Selby, 2 Ld. Raym. 1120.

Statements made in negotiations at any interview before a sale may be warranties. Way v. Martin, 140 Pa. 499.

A verbal warranty of horses on a day when the price was fixed but prior to the actual purchase, when a written bill of sale was made, may be binding on the seller. Hobart v. Young, 12 L. R. A. 686, 68 Vt. —.

But evidence of representations a month before advertised for sale at public auction may become the foundation of an action for breach of warranty in favor of one who, in reliance on them, bids in the property.

(September 4, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the County Court for Rutland County, made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for alleged breach of warranty of a horse. Judgment affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Joel C. Baker, for defendant:

If what passes between a vendor and purchaser forms no part of the negotiation ending in the purchase, it cannot be treated as a warranty. Thus, in the case of a sale by auction, you cannot "tack on a previous private communication to what is said by the auctioneer at the time of the actual public sale, in order to constitute a warranty."

2 Addison, Torts, 1014; Hopkins v. Tunquary, 15 C. B. 180; 2 Benjamin, Sales, pp. 808, 809; Bartlett v. Purnell, 4 Ad. & El. 792; 1 Wait, Act. & Def. 477.

The claimed representations after the sale but before payment were wholly without consideration and are void.

2 Benjamin, Sales, 809.

Mr. D. E. Nicholson for plaintiff.

Start, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant and one Wiley were co-administrators of the estate of William Wiley, and as such administrators had advertised the property of the estate to be sold at public auction on March 14, 1889. On the 21st day of February, 1889, and after the horse in question had been advertised for sale at public auction, the plaintiff went to see the defendant about purchasing him. Her evidence tended to show that the defendant then told her the horse was only twelve years old and sound; that he would not sell him at private sale; that he must be sold at public auction, and she could bid for him there; that she bid off the horse at the auction sale relying upon these representations, which were known to the defendant. After the sale, and before delivery or payment, the defendant repeated these representations. The plaintiff's evidence also tended to show that the horse was twenty years old, and unsound, and that this was known to the defendant at the time he made the representations. The plaintiff claimed to recover upon a warranty and on account of fraud. The defendant requested the court to charge the jury as follows: "No claim of damages for breach of warranty can be predicated upon a sale at auction, unless the representations upon which the claim is made are made at the auction, or in such a manner as to operate as a representation or warranty to any bidder who should become a purchaser at the sale." The court refused to so instruct the jury, to which the defendant excepted. It appears from the exceptions that the charge in other respects was such as the case called for, and that the rules with reference to both branches of it were fully stated, to which no exceptions were taken. By the charge, the jury were left at liberty to find the defendant liable on account of a warranty. In this respect the defendant's counsel claims there was error, and insists that the jury should have been instructed as requested, and contends the plaintiff was not entitled to recover on account of a warranty, because the representations constituting the warranty were made to the plaintiff privately, and to permit such recovery would be to encourage a fraud upon all others attending the sale. We think the defendant is not in a situation to take advantage of his own wrong. To excuse the defendant from liability, under the circumstances of the case, would be a greater fraud upon the plaintiff. The defendant, in effect, said to the plaintiff, when she called to buy the horse: "I am going to sell him through the auctioneer as my agent at such a time and place. He is only twelve years old, and sound. I decline to make the sale myself now, or to fix a price, as I have advertised him for sale at public auction. You can attend the sale, and the price is to be fixed there by the highest bidder." She attends the sale, and makes the purchase, relying, as she had a right to, upon his representations in regard to the age and soundness of the horse.

We are unable to find that the rule contended for by the defendant's counsel has ever been adopted in this State, and we see no good reason for making this case an exception to the general rule applicable to warranties. This general rule is well stated by Rowell, J., in the case of Hobart v. Young, 68 Vt. —, 12 L. R. A. 698: "Any affirmation as to the kind or quality of the thing sold, not uttered as a matter of commendation, opinion, or belief, made by the seller pending the treaty of sale, for the purpose of assuring the purchaser of the truth of the affirmation, and of inducing him to make the purchase, if so received and relied upon by the purchaser, is deemed to be an express warranty."

a sale, offered to establish a warranty, was excluded as too remote. Bryant v. Crosby, 40 Me. 9.

And antecedent representations forming no part of the contract as concluded cannot be regarded as warranties. James v. Bodge, 45 Ark. 284; Zimmerman v. Morrow, 28 Minn. 387.

Representations in a catalogue of articles for sale at auction do not constitute a warranty when the auctioneer at the beginning of the sale publicly announces that the seller warrants nothing. Craig v. Miller, 22 U. C. C. P. 348.

After sale.

A written warranty after the sale, based on a prior oral warranty, is good. Collette v. Weed, 68 Wis. 428.

A warranty written into a bill of sale before payment or delivery, where a question arose after 19 L. R. A.

bidding for a horse at auction, is valid, but it is otherwise if it was done after payment and delivery. McGaughey v. Richardson, 148 Mass. 608.

A warranty after the sale is complete is not valid without a new consideration. Bloss v. Kittridge, 5 Vt. 28; Summers v. Vaughan, 35 Ind. 323; Towell v. Gatewood, 3 Ill. 24; Hogins v. Plympton, 11 Pick. 97; Cady v. Walker, 62 Mich. 157; Morehouse v. Comstock, 42 Wis. 626; Roscorla v. Thomas, 2 Gale & D. 508, 3 Q. B. 284; Grant v. Cadwell, 8 U. C. Q. B. 161.

But if there is a new consideration it may be valid. Congar v. Chamberlain, 14 Wis. 258.

A warranty renewed by the original vendor to a subsequent purchaser from the vendee and relied upon by him in making the purchase is binding. Porter v. Pool, 62 Ga. 238.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

I. S. MILLER, Appt.,
v.W. J. WADDINGHAM et al., Respts.

(.....Cal.)

1. Whether or not in any case buildings that are placed upon land become fixtures, is a question of fact to be determined upon the evidence of that particular case.
2. A vendor of land, who retains the legal title as security for the fulfillment of the contract of purchase, cannot prevent the removal of buildings voluntarily placed on the land by the vendee after taking possession, where a large amount of the purchase money has been paid, and there is nothing to indicate that he will fail to complete his contract, or to show that the land is less valuable than when the contract was made; or that the sufficiency of the security will be, in any way, impaired by such removal.

A PPEAL by complainant from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Bernardino County, in favor of defendants in an action to enjoin the removal of buildings from certain real estate. Affirmed.

A decision was reached and an opinion handed down in this case on January 19, 1891, reversing the judgment of the court below. 11 L. R. A. 510. A rehearing was subsequently granted and the present opinion handed down, affirming such judgment.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Waters & Gird, for appellant:

Plaintiff being the owner of the title can maintain injunction to restrain removal of fixtures.

Civil Code, §§ 826, 8222, subsec. 2; More v. Massini, 32 Cal. 595; Waterman, Trespas, § 927, and notes.

The houses being constructed under an ordinary building contract, for residence purposes, till about one eighth finished, became, from their commencement to said time, fixtures and a part of the realty.

Waterman, Trespas, § 415; Civil Code, § 660, and note.

Messrs. Harris & Gregg, for respondents:

The buildings were put upon the land under an agreement that they should be the property of the builder until paid for. This agreement fixed the status of the buildings. Section 660 of the Civil Code only fixes the status of buildings in the absence of agreements.

Pratt v. Whittier, 58 Cal. 126.

Ownership of buildings, apart from the ownership of the soil, involves the conclusion that the buildings can be moved by the owner.

2 Smith, Lead. Cas. p. 223.

The houses can be moved from the premises, even though when they were placed upon the premises it was supposed they would remain there permanently.

NOTE.—Upon the question of fixtures between vendor and purchaser or mortgagor and mortgagee, see annotation under Overman v. Sasser, 10 L. R. A. 724.

Tift v. Horton, 53 N. Y. 377; Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, 57 Cal. 7; Ford v. Cobb, 20 N. Y. 344.

Agreements making personality of what would, were it not for the agreement, be realty, are valid as against prior mortgagees and subsequent mortgagees or purchasers, who are not innocent purchasers. Such personality can be removed when the severance does not involve serious physical injury to the premises.

Tift v. Horton, Ford v. Cobb and Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, supra.

A grocery and dwelling-house can be made personality by agreement between the parties.

Smith v. Benson, 1 Hill, 176.

The right to remove dwelling-houses, etc., can be transferred.

Ham v. Kendall, 111 Mass. 297.

A house built by one man upon the land of another by his consent is removed by the builder.

1 Washb. Real Prop. pp. 4, 6, 8.

Clubine was the equitable owner of the lots upon which the buildings were erected and in possession. Any agreement therefore made between Clubine and Newman as to the status of the buildings can be enforced against Miller.

Hendy v. Dinkerhoff, 57 Cal. 7, and cases therein cited; Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 608.

Although the vendor may upon breach by the vendee disaffirm the contract, until such disaffirmance he cannot maintain an action for injury to the freehold.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In March, 1887, the plaintiff entered into an agreement in writing with one Clubine, for the sale and conveyance to him of two blocks of land in Ontario, in this State, receiving from him the sum of $9,000 on account of the purchase price of the property, and placed his vendee in possession of the land. Clubine subdivided the land into lots suitable for residence and business purposes, and employed the defendant Newman to construct certain dwelling-houses upon the land, and to furnish the materials therefor, for the sum of $4,100, payable in weekly installments as the work progressed. Shortly after Newman began the construction of the houses, Clubine, failing to make such payments, agreed with him that the houses should belong to said Newman until paid for, and thereupon Newman proceeded with his work, and finished the houses, having received from Clubine only the sum of $725 upon account thereof. Prior to the commencement of this action, Newman sold the houses to the defendants Waddingham and Gargan, and they very soon thereafter commenced to remove them from the land, and had partly completed such removal when the plaintiff commenced this action. The houses were built on redwood mud-sills of two-inch by six-inch timber, resting upon the soil, and the soil was not disturbed in building or removing the houses. The plaintiff brought this action for the purpose of perpetually restraining the defendants from removing the houses from the land, and also to recover from them the sum of $3,000 damages alleged to have been done to his property by the attempted removal. At the commencement of the action a restraining order was issued by the court, and upon the trial of the cause the court rendered judgment in favor of the defendants, and dissolved the restraining order. From this judgment the plaintiff has appealed upon the judgment roll alone.

Although the principal ground urged by the appellant for the reversal of the judgment is that upon the construction of the houses they became fixtures attached to the land, and that by their removal the defendants were committing waste, we think that the respective rights of the parties are to be determined upon principles other than those applicable to the subjects of waste and fixtures. The court below did not find that the buildings in question were fixtures, and, in absence of a finding by it upon that subject, we cannot say upon the facts that were found that they did become fixtures. Whether, in any case, buildings that are placed upon land become fixtures, is a question of fact to be determined upon the evidence of that particular case. The mere erection of a building upon land does not necessarily make it a fixture (Pennybecker v. McDougal, 48 Cal. 160); and in order to determine whether it be a fixture depends upon various circumstances and relations connected with its being placed upon the land. Lavenson v. Standard Soap Co. 80 Cal. 250.

The rules applicable to fixtures have been created by a series of judicial decisions, and these decisions are not always capable of being reconciled. The attempt in the Civil Code to give a definition of a "fixture" only in part removes the difficulty. Section 660 declares that "a thing is deemed to be affixed to land when it is . . . permanently resting upon it, as in the case of buildings;" but it still requires evidence to determine what is "permanently resting" upon the land. The finding in the present case that "said houses were built on redwood mud-sills of two-inch by six-inch timber, said mud-sills resting upon the soil," and that "the soil was not disturbed in building or removing said houses," is consistent with a determination of the court below that the buildings in question were not fixtures, and, for the purpose of upholding its decision, it may be assumed that such determination was made by it. But, without determining whether or not the buildings were fixtures, we are of the opinion that upon other principles applicable to the case the plaintiff is not entitled to the relief sought by him.

The plaintiff has invoked the aid of a court of equity to protect him against threatened injury, and, in order that he may have such protection, it is incumbent upon him to show that he has rights which need and can receive it, and also that the acts charged upon the defendants are an invasion of such rights, and demand such assistance. In his complaint he alleged that he was the owner of certain land upon which certain buildings exist, and that the defendants had committed certain acts of trespass upon the same, causing a damage thereto of $3,000. Upon the trial the court, instead of finding that he was the "owner" of the land upon which the alleged trespass was committed, found that he had made a contract of sale thereof with the grantor of the defendants, and placed his vendee in possession of the land, and that the buildings had been thereafter placed upon the land at the instance of the vendee, and were being removed under authority derived from him. Upon the execution of this contract of sale, the vendee of the plaintiff became vested with the equitable title to said land, and the plaintiff retained in himself the legal title as a security for the performance of the contract by the vendee. By placing his vendee in possession of the land, he thereby conferred upon him the right to its use and enjoyment, so long as he should continue to comply with the obligations of his contract. It may be conceded that, if the buildings had been upon the land at the date of the purchase and had formed a part of the subject matter of the sale, the plaintiff might have had the right to have them remain upon the land as a part of his security until the whole purchase price was paid. In this case, however, the buildings formed no part of the consideration for the purchase of the land, nor were they placed upon the land in pursuance of any terms of the contract of sale. The fact that the plaintiff was under no obligation to give to his vendee possession before a conveyance of the land is immaterial. He did give him possession, and while such possession did not authorize the vendee to do any act which would diminish the value of the property of which he had received the possession, he had the right under his equitable ownership to any use and enjoyment thereof consistent with such obligation. For such use and enjoyment he could not be chargeable with waste. After the execution of a contract of sale the relation of the vendor and vendee to the land is likened to that of mortgagor and mortgagee. The vendor retains the legal title as security for the performance by the vendee of the contract on his part, and by placing the vendee in possession of the land gives to him the right to use and enjoy it as his own, so long as he does not impair its condition, or diminish its value as it existed when received by him. So long as the vendee complies with the terms of his contract he is entitled to retain possession of the land (Willis v. Wozencraft, 22 Cal. 607), and the vendor can at no time enforce payment of more than the agreed price therefor, however much the land may have appreciated in value, or been improved by the vendee. The fact that the vendor holds the legal title as security for such payment does not give him any greater rights than he would possess if he had conveyed the land and taken back a mortgage for the unpaid portion of the purchase money or than are held in land by a mortgagee, who takes for his security a conveyance absolute in form, instead of a formal mortgage. It is a well-recognized principle in equity that a mortgagee cannot maintain an action to restrain waste without showing that thereby his security will be impaired (Robinson v. Russell, 24 Cal. 467; Buckout v. Swift, 27 Cal. 438. See also Perrine v. Marsden, 34 Cal. 14; and, by parity of reasoning, the vendor who holds the legal title as security for the fulfillment of the contract of purchase by the vendee in possession should show that he will sustain some injury before he can maintain an action like the present. So long as the sufficiency of the security is unimpaired, he has no right to disturb the vendee in any use or enjoyment which he may make of the land. Such use and enjoyment by the vendee, is a use of his own property, and unless he thereby impairs the security, or diminishes the estate which he received from the vendor, or the value of the land as he received it, he should not be restrained. In view of these principles, the plaintiff has failed to show any right to the equitable interposition of the court, and the action of the court in dismissing his complaint was correct. It is not alleged in his complaint, nor is it found by the court, that the vendee has in any respect failed to comply with the terms of his contract, or that he is unwilling or unable to do so. The record does not disclose the terms of the contract of sale,—either the amount of the purchase price remaining unpaid, or the time when it will become payable. Nor is it alleged or found that the land is less valuable than it was at the date of the contract of sale, or how great is the obligation for which the plaintiff holds it as security. In the absence of any allegation or finding to the contrary, it must be assumed that the land is fully as valuable as at the date of the contract, and that the vendee is not only able to comply with his obligations, but that he will fully and promptly meet them as they mature. Inasmuch, then, as the plaintiff has received $9,000 towards the payment of the purchase price of the land, he does not show any impairment of his security or injury to himself by the fact that the defendants are threatening to remove from the land buildings placed thereon by themselves, and which are shown to be of the value of only $4,100.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

Sallie A. HEWLETT, Appt.,

v.

W. W. GEORGE, Exr., etc., of Sarah A. Ragsdale, Deceased.

(...Miss....)

1. The privilege extended by Code, § 1608, to a female plaintiff in an action to testify by deposition taken before trial does not, in view of the Statute forbidding one to testify as a witness to establish his claim against a decedent's estate, extend to having the deposition read in case defendant dies before trial, and the action is revived against her executor notwithstanding defendant is also a female and might have had her deposition taken to meet plaintiff's and so prevented plaintiff from securing any undue advantage over her.

2. Punitive damages for a personal wrong cannot, under the Mississippi statutes, be recovered against the personal representative of the wrong-doer.

3. Compensatory damages recoverable by one wrongfully confined in an insane asylum may include an award for mental anguish, shame, and mortification, and injury to character.

4. A minor cannot maintain an action against its parent for wrongful confinement in an insane asylum where the relation of parent and child with its reciprocal duties has not been dissolved between them.

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lauderdale County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the wrongful confinement of plaintiff in an insane asylum by defendant's testatrix. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Witherspoon & Witherspoon, for appellant:

It was error to exclude plaintiff's deposition. At the time it was taken, May 31, 1888, Mrs. Ragsdale was living. She was notified of the taking of the deposition, and her counsel were present. She afterwards had more than six months in which to take her own deposition, which she, being a woman, was entitled to have taken under § 1608 of the Code. Under such circumstances, it cannot be said that plaintiff, by her deposition, is testifying against the estate of the deceased person.

Strickland v. Hudson, 55 Miss. 235.

The competency of a witness is to be determined by the facts existing at the time the testimony is given. The deposition was given while the defendant was living.

The testimony was competent when taken, and became then a part of the evidence in the case.

All statutes which provide for the perpetuation of evidence are in furtherance of justice and should receive a liberal construction.

Pratt v. Patterson, 81 Pa. 114.

The test of present admissibility is the competency of the testimony at the time it was given.

NOTE.—Punitive damages.

As regards the rule that prohibits an action to recover punitive damages against the representative of a deceased wrong-doer, the doctrine of the principal case is vindicated by the following authorities: Ripley v. Miller, 33 N. C. 217; Edwards v. Ricks, 30 Ia. Ann. 923; Sheik v. Hobson, 64 Iowa. 143; Wright v. Donnell, 34 Tex. 291. See Sedgw. Dam. § 362; 2 Watt, Act. & Def. 451; and see note to Quinn v. South Carolina R. Co. (S. C.) 1 L. R. A. 682.

thorities: Ripley v. Miller, 33 N. C. 217; Edwards v. Ricks, 30 Ia. Ann. 923; Sheik v. Hobson, 64 Iowa. 143; Wright v. Donnell, 34 Tex. 291. See Sedgw. Dam. § 362; 2 Watt, Act. & Def. 451; and see note to Quinn v. South Carolina R. Co. (S. C.) 1 L. R. A. 682.

The court erred in refusing to instruct that mental suffering, shame and humiliation, and injury to reputation are not proper elements of compensatory damages.

Messrs. Walker & Hall, for appellee:

The deposition was properly suppressed under Rev. Code 1880, § 1602, because its effect was to establish her own claim against the estate of a deceased person.

Jacks v. Bridewell, 51 Miss. 881; Wood v. Stafford, 50 Miss. 870; Rushing v. Rushing, 52 Miss. 829; Buie v. Buie, 67 Miss. 456.

In trespass against executors and administrators, Rev. Code 1880, § 2080, provides "that in assessing damages, the jury shall only render a verdict for the amount the plaintiff may prove that he or she actually sustained, and vindictive damages shall not be given."

See 1 Suth. Dam. p. 758; 5 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 42, note.

The only injury shown by the testimony to have been suffered by appellant is the pecuniary loss of $200 paid her attorney for services in having her released from the asylum.

Plaintiff is not entitled to recover any amount for the reason that she was a minor, and though previously married had separated from her husband and was living at the time with her mother, Mrs. Sallie A. Ragsdale.

Woods, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The deposition of plaintiff, taken in a pending suit, in a court of law, during the lifetime of defendant's testatrix, on the final trial of this cause, and after the death of the original defendant and the revivor against the executor of the deceased, was offered in evidence on behalf of plaintiff, and on motion of defendant was excluded by the trial court, and this action of the court is assigned for error. Relying upon the proposition that the competency of a witness is determinable by the facts existing at the time the testimony of such witness is given, counsel for appellant, with much vigor and ingenuity, contend that the appellant's deposition was competent evidence, even under our Statute which forbids any person testifying as a witness to establish his claim against the estate of a deceased person which originated during the lifetime of such deceased person. Code 1880, § 1602. Reported cases from New York, Pennsylvania and Maryland are cited and relied upon by counsel as directly supporting this contention. If these decisions had been made in cases similar to the one at bar, and upon statutes identical with ours, we should feel constrained, nevertheless, to decline to follow them. But we are unable to say they were made in cases involving the same or similar facts as those shown in the record before us, or upon statutes identical with ours. They may be perfectly correct expositions of the laws existing in the States where rendered, and yet be not at all persuasive as authority in this State. The argument of counsel is that under section 1608, Code 1880, the plaintiff had the right to have her own deposition taken in this cause; that the original defendant was then alive, and, by her counsel, attended the taking of such deposition, and was made acquainted with its contents and their significance; that, thus advised and warned, it was the right of defendant then to have procured the taking of her own deposition, with a view to meeting, if she could, the case made against her by plaintiff's evidence contained in her deposition; and that, having failed or neglected to have her own deposition taken when she might have done so, her executor cannot now be heard to say that the lips of the plaintiff are sealed by law because the defendant's have been sealed by death. The argument is plausible, but fallacious, we think. Let us assume that the deposition of the plaintiff was taken because she was a female,—a class of cases covered by the fifth paragraph of section 1608. In this particular case, the original defendant being likewise a female, it is contended she might have enjoyed the same right accorded the gentler sex by our law, and have procured her own deposition to be taken, and have it used, and her executor might also have used her deposition on this trial; and no advantage could have, in such case, accrued to plaintiff, nor possible harm or injustice to defendant or to the executor of her will on final trial. If all citizens of the State were females, or if all suitors in the law courts were females, the construction of our statutes, necessarily involved in appellant's contentions, would be greatly strengthened. But, beside the favored class to whom the Statute extends the personal privilege of testifying by deposition, there exists that large and litigious and unfavored class, the male citizen, upon whom no such privilege has been conferred. Now, let us suppose the original defendant in this suit to have been a male—one of the unprivileged class,—upon whom the right to testify by deposition had not been conferred; and let us further suppose such male defendant had been alive at the time of taking plaintiff's deposition, without the power or privilege of preparing to meet it by having his own deposition taken, and that he had subsequently died before trial,—could it be reasonably insisted that the plaintiff's deposition could have been properly introduced in evidence on the trial of the suit revived against the dead man's executor? If not, the argument of counsel is specious, in this: that by the same statute we have two rules for recovery of claims against the estates of decedents prescribed,—one working no advantage to the plaintiff, nor hardship to the defendant, where both parties are females; but the other working unconscionable advantage to the plaintiff, and gross inequality and injustice to the defendant, where the plaintiff is a female and the defendant is a male. This incongruous construction is not to be tolerated. The general laws of the State touching property, none the less than life and liberty, must bear uniformly on male and female alike, and the mere deference shown woman by our laws, in permitting her, in certain states of cases, to withdraw from a public examination as a witness in open court, and to testify by deposition, must not be extended beyond the obvious purpose of the Legislature. Moreover, under the Statute we are considering (sec. 1608), it seems certain from an examination of the sixth paragraph of said section that in cases such as we have presented in this record the competency of a witness does not depend absolutely upon the facts existing at the time the deposition was taken; for, notwithstanding the fact that the deposition of a female, or of any witness residing in this State, but more than sixty miles from the place of trial, may have been taken, yet, on proper showing, the female or other witness residing more than sixty miles away may be compelled to appear and testify in open court. In these classes of cases the competency of the evidence offered does not depend absolutely upon the facts existing at the time the deposition was taken, but upon the conditions existing at the time of trial. We see no error in the rulings of the court on this point.

The action of the court, in its instructions, in excluding from the consideration of the jury the question of punitive damages, is also assigned for error. On this point it will be sufficient to say that at common law the action would have been abated upon the death of the defendant, and no recovery could have been had against her representative. The doctrine was that for a personal wrong the offender could not be followed into the grave, and the dead be visited with punishment. Our Statutes have modified the common law to the extent of permitting a recovery against the representative of the deceased wrong-doer to an amount sufficient to compensate for the actual damage sustained by the injured party; but the realm of the dead is not invaded, and punishment visited upon the dead.

This brings us next to the instructions of the court touching compensatory damages. By the second instruction asked by plaintiff and refused by the court, and by the instruction given for the defendant, the jury were shut up to return damages, if they found for the plaintiff, not exceeding the actual amount in dollars and cents shown to have been expended by the plaintiff in procuring her release from the insane asylum. It is true that in the instruction given for defendant the jury was told that a recovery might be had for actual damages, but by the second refused instruction of the plaintiff actual damages were held not to include compensation for mental suffering and pain, the sense of humiliation, shame, and disgrace, and injury to reputation, inflicted upon and endured by plaintiff. Here was actual damage to the extent of $200, and actual damage for eleven days of time lost during confinement in the asylum, and to these should have been added damages for mental pain and suffering, shame and mortification, and injury to character. Surely these injuries were real ones, and compensation for these would have been an award of actual damages. Compensatory and actual damages are one; and compensation for wrongs done to one's character is in no sense punitive. We cannot consent that actual damages, in this case, must be confined to the few dollars and cents shown to have been expended by plaintiff to secure her release from the asylum, and that no compensatory damages were awardable for shame and anguish and hurt to character. On this point we are of opinion the action of the trial court was erroneous, and that its judgment must be reversed. We decline, however, to reinstate the verdict of the jury on the first trial, because we are not satisfied as to plaintiff's right to a recovery absolutely. The evidence shows that the plaintiff was the minor daughter of the defendant, who had been married, but who, at the time of the alleged injuries, was separated and living away from her husband. Whether she had resumed her former place in her mother's house, and the relationship, with its reciprocal rights and duties, of a minor child to her parent, does not sufficiently appear. If by her marriage the relation of parent and child had been finally dissolved, in so far as that relationship imposed the duty upon the parent to protect and care for and control, and the child to aid and comfort and obey, then it may be the child could successfully maintain an action against the parent for personal injuries. But so long as the parent is under obligation to care for, guide and control, and the child is under reciprocal obligation to aid and comfort and obey, no such action as this can be maintained. The peace of society, and of the families composing society, and a sound public policy, designed to subserve the repose of families and the best interests of society, forbid to the minor child a right to appear in court in the assertion of a claim to civil redress for personal injuries suffered at the hands of the parent. The State, through its criminal laws, will give the minor child protection from parental violence and wrong-doing, and this is all the child can be heard to demand. On this very delicate and difficult point in the case the evidence is most unsatisfactory, and for this reason, if for no other, we decline to reinstate the first verdict.

benefit makes a change of "interest," if not of title or possession within the meaning of an insurance policy providing against incumbrances by chattel mortgage and changes in interest, title or possession.

(October 30, 1891.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action upon a policy of fire insurance. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. George W. Bates, for appellants: The incumbrance was not valid and conveyed no specific interest in the property.

It is not in the power of either partner to dispose of the firm property in payment of his private debts.

The interest of a partner is not separable, and cannot be seized, nor any part of the partnership property taken on process against either partner and that only which may be determined to exist on a settlement of the partnership.

Sirrine v. Briggs, 31 Mich. 443; Haynes v. Knowles, 36 Mich. 407; Hutchinson v. Dubois, 45 Mich. 143.

Such a mortgage passes no title to nor creates any lien upon the firm property, and does not affect the right or title of his co-partner, and is absolutely void as against the partnership or its creditors.

Such a disposition of the firm property does not divert the title of the partnership in favor of the private creditor.

No fraudulent act of one partner as to the partnership property would affect the partnership.

Edwards v. Hughes, 20 Mich. 289.

Such a mortgage is a void mortgage, and is not enforceable as against the partnership or McMurdie, the co-partner, who can ignore it; and as such would not vitiate the policy under the clause against incumbrances. A mortgage to affect an insurance must be valid and enforceable.

The same principle is applied to subsequent insurance under a clause against additional insurance, without the consent of the company, and it is held that such insurance will not affect the prior insurance unless the latter is valid and effectual.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs were partners, carrying on a grocery business in the City of Detroit. On the 1st day of May, 1890, they procured a policy of insurance of $400 in the defendant Company on a stock of flour, feed, and other goods, and $150 on hay, etc. The policy was for one year. After the insurance was procured, it appears one of the plaintiffs gave a chattel mortgage upon the property described to secure an individual debt of his. On July 12, 1890, the goods caught fire, and were destroyed and injured to the extent of $319.87. The defendant Company had no knowledge of the chattel mortgage until after the fire. They refused to pay the loss, and on the trial in the circuit court the jury was instructed to find a verdict for the defendant. Plaintiffs bring error.

The policy sued upon is what is known as a "Michigan Standard Policy," and contains this clause: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the subject of insurance be personal property, and be or become incumbered by a chattel mortgage; or if any change other than by death of the insured takes place in the interest, title, or possession, whether by legal process or judgment, or by the voluntary act of the insured or otherwise."

The defense of the action is based upon the proposition that the placing of the chattel mortgage by one partner upon the partnership property for his individual benefit works a change in the interest of the insured, so that the policy becomes void under the stipulation above quoted, contained in the policy. This stipulation in the policy in regard to giving chattel mortgages is valid and reasonable, and we think the court below not in error in directing verdict for defendant. The placing of the chattel mortgage by one partner for his individual benefit upon the partnership chattels works a change of interest therein.

In Hicks v. Farmers Ins. Co., 71 Iowa, 119, it was held: "A condition in a fire insurance policy issued to a firm, that property should not afterwards be in any manner incumbered, was violated by the execution of a mortgage by one of the partners on his undivided one-third interest in the property, and by a judgment against him, which became a lien upon his said interest."

We think the Company discharged from liability on the policy by such an incumbrance without its knowledge, or any notice to it, and its assent thereto. The placing of the chattel mortgage there by one partner may not have changed the title or possession, but there was a change of interest, which was provided against by the policy. The court was not in error in directing verdict and judgment for defendant.

The judgment of the court below will be affirmed, with costs.

A state statute requiring a carrier, who brings into the State a person not having a settlement therein, to remove him from the State upon request of the proper officers if he falls into distress within a year, or to be liable for his support, is an unconstitutional regulation of commerce.

(April 16, 1891.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Penobscot County (Libbey, J.,) for the opinion of the full court, of an action brought to recover from defendants the cost of maintaining certain Italians whom defendants had brought into the State and who subsequently became a public charge. Judgment for defendants.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Henry L. Mitchell, City Solicitor, for plaintiff:

Each of the several States in the Union has the right to pass necessary and reasonable laws to protect the people of such States from the introduction of criminals, paupers, and diseased persons into their community.

A law is not unconstitutional, because it may prohibit what one conscientiously thinks right, or require what he may conscientiously think wrong.

Donahue v. Richards, 38 Me. 379.

Whether an enactment is reasonable, or for the benefit of the people, is for the Legislature alone to decide.

Moor v. Veazie, 32 Me. 348.

All Acts of the Legislature are presumed to be constitutional; and the court will never pronounce a Statute to be otherwise, unless in a case where the point is free from all doubt.

State v. Lunt, 6 Me. 412.

The object of the Legislature was to prevent

NOTE.—State laws imposing taxes or penalties upon immigration are unconstitutional.

State legislation, which seeks to impose a direct burden upon interstate commerce, or to interfere directly with its freedom, encroaches upon the exclusive power of Congress. Hall v. De Cuir, 95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547.

Any attempt on the part of the State to regulate commerce of a national or interstate character is an interference with that federal power which, under the Constitution of the United States, is vested solely in Congress. *Henderson v. A tax levied under N. Y. Stat. of May 31, 1881, on every passenger from a foreign country in the port of New York, who is not a citizen of the United States, has been repeatedly decided by the United States Supreme Court to be a regulation of commerce with foreign nations, a subject confided by the Constitution to the exclusive control of Congress. Henderson v. New York, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543; Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 13 L. R. A.

Recull of the decisions in "The Passenger Cases."

The result of "The Passenger Cases," 48 U. S. 7 How. 233, 12 L. ed. 702, was to hold that a tax demanded of the master or owner of the vessel for every passenger was a regulation of commerce by the State in conflict with the Constitution and the laws of the United States, and therefore void. Hence, a statute which imposes a burdensome and almost impossible condition on the ship-master as a prerequisite to his landing his passengers, with an alternative payment of a small sum of money for each of them, is a tax on the ship-owner for the right to land such passengers, and, in effect, on the passenger himself, since the ship-master makes him pay it in advance as part of his fare. Henderson v. Wickham, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543.

What commerce includes.

Commerce includes navigation. It means intercourse and includes all the instruments by which intercourse is carried on. It includes, also, all the subjects of such intercourse, and the transportation of persons as much as that of property. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Fuller, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 560, 21 L. ed. 710; Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 189, 215, 6 L. ed. 68-74; Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 35, 13 L. ed. 745; The "Passenger Cases," 48 U. S. 7 How. 405, 413, 12 L. ed. 753-756; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Maryland, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 452, 22 L. ed. 673.

Commerce includes an intercourse of persons, as well as the importation of merchandise. "The Passenger Cases," 48 U. S. 7 How. 233, 12 L. ed. 702.

The immigration of foreigners to this country their transportation to and admission at the port of one State for the purpose of passing through that State to another State for residence in the latter, and the whole subject of passengers from foreign ports to and through the various States of the Union, is palpably a subject which is national in the tax-payers of the State of Maine from being burdened by an influx of pauper element brought here by transportation companies either from foreign countries or from any other of the States and prevent them from being public charges as paupers; this being the case and the object of the Statute, it is a valid Statute and should be upheld as such.

Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 490, 31 L. ed. 708; United States License Cases, 46 U. S. 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256; Cooley v. Port Wardens of Phila. 53 U. S. 12 How. 299, 13 L. ed. 996.

The Statute cannot be construed as intending to regulate commerce, but relates to the police internal government of the State, and this right is reserved by States, and the Statute of Maine under consideration is a valid Statute.

New York v. Miln, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 182, 9 L. ed. 659; Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694. See also Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508; *Powell v. Messrs. Wilson & Woodard, for defendants:

The provisions of the Statute in question constitute a regulation of commerce with foreign countries and among the States, and are the broadest sense. The interests of the nation require one uniform system of regulation of that branch of commerce. State Tax on Ry. Gross Receipts, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 297, 21 L. ed. 109; State Freight Tax Case, 82 U. S. 115 Wall. 232, 21 L. ed. 146; Cooley v. Port Wardens of Philadelphia, 53 U. S. 12 How. 299, 319, 13 L. ed. 996-1004; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Maryland, 88 U. S. 21 Wall. 472, 22 L. ed. 684.

It was said in United States v. Holliday, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 417, 18 L. ed. 185, that commerce with foreign nations means commerce between citizens of the United States and citizens or subjects of foreign governments. It means trade and commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations in all its branches. It includes navigation as the principal means by which foreign intercourse is effected. To regulate this trade and intercourse is to prescribe the rules by which it shall be conducted. "The mind," says the great chief justice, "can scarcely conceive a system for regulating commerce between nations which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation, which shall be silent on the admission of the vessels of one nation into the ports of another;" and he might have added, with equal force, which prescribes no terms for the admission of their cargo or their passengers. Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 190, 6 L. ed. 68; Henderson v. Wickham, 82 U. S. 259, 271, 23 L. ed. 542, 548.

Landing passengers is an incident to their transportation.

The commerce with foreign nations and between the States, which consists in the transportation of persons and property between them, is a subject of national character and requires uniformity of regulation. Congress alone can deal with such transportation, and its nonaction is a declaration that it shall remain free from burdens imposed by state legislation. Receiving and landing passengers and freight is incident to their transportation. All re-therefore beyond the power of any State to make.

Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 288; Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158.

Interstate transportation of passengers is beyond the reach of a state legislature.

State Freight Tax Case, 82 U. S. 15 Wall. 232, 21 L. ed. 146; Stoutenburgh v. Hennick, 129 U. S. 141, 32 L. ed. 637; Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 485, 31 L. ed. 700.

It cannot be fairly said that if these statutory provisions do relate to interstate commerce, or to commerce with foreign countries, they do not assume to regulate such commerce.

Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158.

Regulating commerce is prescribing the rules by which it shall be governed, that is prescribing the conditions upon which it shall be conducted, determining when it shall be free and when subject to duties or other exactions.

If each State was at liberty to regulate the conduct of carriers while within its jurisdiction, the confusion likely to follow could not but be productive of great inconvenience and unnecessary hardship.

Hall v. DeCuir, 95 U. S. 485, 24 L. ed. 547.

Although the penalty imposed by these provisions is laid upon the carriers, ultimately it must fall upon the passengers carried, and if, under these provisions, burdens are laid upon the carriers, the cost of sustaining the burdens straints by exactions in the form of taxes upon such transportation or upon acts necessary to its completion are invasions of the exclusive power of Congress. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158.

A law or a rule emanating from any lawful authority which prescribes terms or conditions on which alone the vessel can discharge its passengers is a regulation of commerce; and, in case of vessels and passengers coming from foreign ports, is a regulation of commerce with foreign nations. Henderson v. Wickham, 82 U. S. 259, 271, 23 L. ed. 548-549.

A statute that imposes a burdensome and almost impossible condition on the ship-master, as a prerequisite to his landing his passengers, with an alternative payment of a small sum of money for each, is a regulation of commerce, and void. Ibid.

The only state interference with the landing and receiving of passengers and freight which is permissible is confined to such measures as will prevent confusion among the vessels and collision between them, insure their safety and convenience, and facilitate the discharge or receipt of their passengers and freight. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, supra.

If a law passed by a State comes in conflict with a law passed by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution, they affect the subject and each other like equal opposing powers. The nullity of any Act inconsistent with the Constitution is produced by the declaration that the Constitution is supreme. Where the federal government has acted, its Act is supreme; and the laws of the State, though enacted in the exercise of powers not controverted, must yield to it. Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 210, 6 L. ed. 73.

must be obtained by the carrier by increasing its charges for carriage. In this respect the cost of carrying the burden imposed by these provisions is like the tax under consideration in—

The Passenger Cases, 48 U. S. 7 How. 283, 12 L. ed. 702. See Crandall v. Nevada, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 35, 18 L. ed. 745.

Nor can these provisions be sustained as a legitimate exercise of the police power of the State, because, under the authorities hereinbefore referred to, it is a plain regulation of interstate commerce, or of commerce with foreign nations.

Whenever the statute of a State invades the domain of legislation which belongs exclusively to the Congress of the United States it is void, no matter under what class of powers it may fall, or how closely allied it may be to powers conceded to belong to the States.

Libbey, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants were the owners of the steamer Caroline Miller, in December, 1887, and January, 1888, which they used as common carriers for passengers and merchandise between the City of New York, in the State of New York, and Bangor, in this State; and by said steamer brought from New York into Bangor, on the 9th of December, 1887, 56 Italians, who came into this State to work as laborers on the Canadian Pacific Railroad. But for some reason they ceased to work on said road, and on the 14th of December, 1887, returned to the City of Bangor, and it is alleged by the plaintiff were destitute, and in need of relief; and the overseers of the poor of said City, on application therefor, took charge of them, and furnished them with relief as paupers. And on the 19th day of said December, it is claimed by the plaintiff that the City through its officers tendered to the defendants at their wharf, and at their steamer in Bangor, the alleged paupers, and requested that the defendants should receive them and carry them back to New York. This the defendants declined to do, and thereupon the City paid their passage on board said steamer from Bangor to New York.

This action is brought to recover for the necessary supplies furnished said alleged paupers after they were tendered to the defendants, and to recover the money paid for their fare for transportation to New York. The plaintiff claims to recover by virtue of section 50 of chapter 24 of the Revised Statutes of this State, which reads as follows: "Any common carrier who brings into the State a person not having a settlement therein shall remove him beyond the State if he falls into distress within a year: provided, that such person is delivered on board a boat or at a station of such carrier by the overseers or municipal officers requesting such removal; and, in default thereof, such carrier is liable in assumpsit for the expense of such person's support after such default."

The defendant's claim that this Statute is unconstitutional and void, and furnishes the plaintiff no ground for the maintenance of this action; and this is the question for our determination.

Congress has power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States and with the Indian tribes." Const. U. S. art. 1, § 8, cl. 8. That the carrying of persons from a foreign country into the United States or from State to State, is commerce within the meaning of this clause of the Constitution is too well settled to justify the citation of authorities. The bringing of persons by common carriers, then, from another State into this State is commerce between the States. Is the state statute which we have quoted a regulation of commerce? We think it is. In Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527, the court says: "Transportation is essential to commerce, or rather it is commerce itself; and every obstacle to it, or burden laid upon it, by legislative authority is a regulation." It is imposing an additional duty upon the carrier. It makes the commerce more burdensome to the carrier; for, after a person is landed in this State, it imposes upon the carrier the responsibility for his pecuniary condition for a year.

But it is claimed that this is the exercise of the police power of the State. That the State, in the exercise of its police power, may indirectly to some extent affect commerce between foreign countries and the United States or between States, may be conceded. Just what the police power of the State embraces, and how far it extends, does not appear to have been definitely determined. It may exercise it to require quarantine or inspection before landing, of persons brought from abroad. It may exercise it to prevent the landing of passengers infected with contagious disease. It may exercise it over the landing of convicted felons from abroad. It may exercise it over persons who have been subject to contagious disease, so as to be liable to be infected by it, and communicate it to others, and thereby endanger the health of the community. But it cannot exercise it to prevent commerce, nor can it exercise it over the carrying and landing of persons who are not at the time they are brought into the State in a condition to be dangerous to the public. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, supra; Henderson v. New York, 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543; Chy Lung v. Freeman, 92 U. S. 275, 23 L. ed. 550. It cannot exercise it over persons who are free from contagion, who have not been subject to any danger of contagious disease, on the ground that they may become dangerous in that respect within a year or any other fixed period of time after landing. It has been said that it may exercise it to prevent the bringing into the State of paupers,—persons who have no means of support, who are destitute, and dependent upon public charity. But it cannot exercise it over a person who is not a pauper when landed, on the ground that he may become a pauper within some fixed period of time. While we do not undertake to determine just where the police power of the State in regard to these matters terminates, it is safe to say that it does not embrace the subjects that we have last pointed out.

This Statute is broad and general in its terms. It embraces all persons brought into the State, having no settlement in the State; and as it is found in the Pauper Statute, the term "settlement" must be held to mean a pauper settlement, without regard to the fact whether the person is poor at the time when he is brought into the State or wealthy. He may be worth thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars when he is landed in the State, and, from the various vicissitudes that men are subject to, within a year from that time may not have a dollar, may be destitute, and in need of support as a pauper. He may, when brought into the State, be a citizen of the State, having no settlement in it; and still, under the terms of the Statute, if he becomes a pauper within a year, it is the duty of the carrier who brings him here to take him and carry him out of the State. By what authority may it be done? A citizen of the State has the legal right to come into it, either with the aid of a common carrier or without such aid. Every citizen of the United States has the right to enter every other State for temporary purposes or to become a citizen of such State. Suppose the carrier who brings him in undertakes to seize him and carry him out of the State because he has lost his property within a year, and become needy. Would not the courts interfere at once on application therefor, and discharge him from such unlawful restraint? We think it is clearly so. Then, again, what right would the carrier have, if he is a pauper, and the police power of the State extends to the extent to prevent the landing of paupers within it to carry him out of this State, and land him in another State?

But it is unnecessary to discuss the effect of this Statute further. Its provisions are too broad and sweeping to be considered within the power of the State. It is the exercise of a power granted solely to the United States, which the State cannot exercise. It is so general that, as we have said, it applies to all persons brought into the State by a carrier, without regard to wealth or poverty when brought in; but undertakes to impose upon the carrier the burden of removing or supporting him if he shall within the time named become destitute.

It is said by counsel that it is aimed against pauperism, and may be sustained as valid as to persons who are paupers when brought into the State. Its terms are general. It cannot be divided, and held to be valid as to one class of persons and invalid as to others.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

Elizabeth HARALSON, Impleaded, etc.,
Plff. in Err.,
v.

W. I. McARTHUR.

(.....Ga.....)

*1. The defendant's attorney being absent with leave of the court on account of sickness, his relationship to the case being known to counsel for the plaintiff, although his name was not marked on the docket, his leave of absence applied to the case; and, if his client was also absent on account of a public announcement made by the judge in open court (she being then present and hearing it) that no case would be taken up in which the absent counsel was concerned, the judgment against such defendant ought to be set aside upon application made at the same term, supported by an affidavit of a meritorious defense.

2. A joint verdict and judgment against several defendants, some of whom were never served, and had not waived service by appearance, should be set aside on motion made at the same term.

(July 8, 1891.)

ERROR to the Superior Court for Montgomery County to review a decision refusing to set aside a judgment rendered against defendant Haralson during the absence from court of her attorney. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Martin & Smith and H. W. Carswell for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. E. A. Smith, D. C. McLennan and DeLacy & Bishop, for defendant in error:

It is not the fault of plaintiff or his counsel that the name of counsel for Haralson was not marked on the docket, and they are not responsible for its not being marked, nor for the counsel's relying upon the judge upon a private application to have his name marked, and it was the duty of defendant Haralson and her counsel to file their defense at the first term instead of allowing the case to be marked in default, and hence the motion to set aside should be denied.

Storey v. Weaver, 66 Ga. 300; Morris v. Morris, 76 Ga. 733; Graham v. Smith, 80 Ga. 676.

Motion for a new trial is the remedy, and not a motion to set aside the judgment.

Ga. Code, 3590.

McArthur could have sued Haralson alone for the trespass, and having sued several joint trespassers could have dismissed as to all but Haralson, and proceeded against her alone; and the fact that verdict and judgment were rendered improperly against other co-defendants, who are not complaining, furnishes no cause of complaint for Haralson who was duly served, and against whom the verdict and judgment were properly rendered.

Brooks v. Ashburn, 9 Ga. 302.

Simmons, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. At the time the judgment was rendered in this case in the court below, Mr. Stanley, the attorney of Mrs. Haralson, one of the defendants, was absent from the court under a leave granted on account of sickness. This providential cause would have been a sufficient excuse for his absence without any leave from the court. It was known to plaintiff's counsel that he had been employed in this case, although his name was not marked on the docket. Mrs. Haralson heard the judge announce in open court that no case in which Mr. Stanley was concerned as counsel would be taken up. For this reason she was not present when the case was called, and, doubtless for the same reason, made no arrangement to be represented by other counsel. She ascertained during the term that a judgment had been rendered against her, and immediately before the expiration of the term moved to set the same aside, which the court declined to do. This decision, in our opinion, was erroneous. Although Mr. Stanley had neither filed a plea for defendant nor caused his name to be marked on the docket, his client should not, in our opinion, suffer on account of his failure to do these things, because at the time the case was called and disposed of he was at home sick, and unable to attend to any business. If his leave of absence had been obtained for any other cause, he could at least have done what was necessary to inform the court what cases were to be affected by the leave granted. This he could have accomplished by furnishing the court with a list of his cases, or by seeing to it that his name was marked on the docket in all of them. Where an attorney is well, and gets a leave of absence from the court for his own convenience, it would be negligence to allow a case he was employed to defend to stand on the docket till called for a final disposition, without having previously done anything whatever to inform the court the case was to be contested, and that he represented the defendant. There seems to be no good reason, other than sickness or some other providential cause, why an attorney could not do this much, in person or otherwise, before the case was reached in its order for a hearing; and, unless prevented by such cause, he would have until then to protect his cases under his leave of absence; but where he is sick his opportunity to do so does not extend up to that time, and for this reason we think the rule above indicated should be modified in a case like this, where providential interference cuts an attorney off from the full exercise of his rights and privileges.

In the case of Bentley v. Finch (Ga.) 13 S. E. Rep. 155, the record shows that the judge stated to Mr. Humphreys, counsel for defendant, who was present in the court, he would not try that day any case in which he was employed, yet nevertheless, on the same day did render judgment against his client in a case wherein Mr. Humphreys' name was not marked on the docket, the judge not knowing that he was employed therein. The court below afterwards set that judgment aside, and was, we think, properly reversed by this court for so doing. The suit was upon an unconditional written contract, and was in default, no plea having been filed, and no counsel's name having been marked for defendant on the docket. Mr. Humphreys' client relied upon the clerk to enter his name, and, this being at his own risk, he could take nothing by the clerk's failure to comply with his request. Again Mr. Humphreys was present in court when the judge made the announcement as to his cases, and there is no reason why he could not have then had his name marked in the cases he defended, or at least have informed the judge what his cases were. Nothing of the sort was done, and under these facts we thought no sufficient reason appeared for setting the judgment aside. In the Bentley Case, the motion to set aside the judgment was not made at the term at which it was rendered, as was done in the case at bar; nor does the record in the former allege that defendant or his counsel were ignorant till after the term closed, of the rendition of the judgment, or state any reason whatever why the motion to set aside was not made during the term. These two cases differ in many respects, but the controlling distinction between them is that in one the defendant's counsel was prevented by providential interference from giving all needed attention to his client's interests, and in the other he was not, but had ample and sufficient opportunity to do so, and by availing himself thereof could have prevented the rendition of the judgment.

2. This was an action against several defendants, including the plaintiff in error, some of whom were not served at all, and never had their day in court. The verdict and judgment being a joint one in favor of the plaintiff against all the defendants, ought not to stand. Those who were not served, of course, are not bound by it; and this fact would effectually prevent the plaintiff in error, in case she satisfied the judgment, from having her right to contribution from all her co-defendants. In the event she should demand such contribution, they would only have to reply they were not bound by the judgment at all, and that it established no right against them in favor of anyone. If the plaintiff had obtained judgment against those defendants only who were served, it may have been valid as to them; but inasmuch as the judgment is against all the defendants, including those not served, we are clear it should be set aside for the reason above stated.

Judgment reversed.

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County overruling a demurrer to the declaration and admitting certain evidence as well as to instructions and refusals to instruct made in an action brought to recover money alleged to be due under a contract for the purchase of certain patent rights which resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Sustained.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Mr. Charles M. Barnes for defendant.

Mr. Thomas William Clarke for plaintiff.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was the owner of certain letters-patent, and of an invention on which letters-patent had been applied for, all for methods or processes of manufacturing electrical conducting wires. On April 26, 1887, he made a contract in writing with the defendant to sell these letters-patent and inventions, and stipulated also to sell and convey any other letters-patent which he should obtain or inventions which he should make for wires of similar compounds during the term mentioned in the contract. The contract proceeds in the following language: "The conditions of sale, and the payments to be made, and the times and mode of so making them are hereinafter expressly stipulated, as follows:—

"Said Warren S. Hill, or his assigns, shall pay to said Williamson, his heirs or assigns, the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars in one year from the first day of May, A. D. 1887."

[Then follows a statement of sums to be paid annually on the first day of May for fourteen years from May 1, 1887, amounting in all, including the $2,500, to $250,000.]

It being understood and provided that in case any of the aforesaid payments being due, and having been demanded, and such payment be not made or tendered within the sixty days next succeeding such demand (except as is hereinbefore provided), then and in that case this contract and agreement and sale shall be null and void and of no effect from the date so determined, and the patents shall revert to said Williamson or to his assigns, discharged of any obligations of whatever nature due to this contract, and of any rights to manufacture thereunder." The next clause relates to the places where the payments are to be made. The next stipulates that the defendant or his assigns may at any time within two years from the 1st day of May, 1887, make payment or tender of payment of $100,000 in cash to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff shall receive the same and the title to all such payments "shall pass absolutely to said Hill or his assigns discharged of all future payments."

The last provision is as follows: "Said Warren S. Hill may assign this agreement, subject to all the conditions of payment, to any person or corporation; and in case of the payment by such assigns or their assigns, or their successors in interest, at or before the conclusion of any calendar year, or shall make the special single payment on or before May 1, 1889, as above stipulated, the sale hereby provided for shall inure to the benefit of such assigns or persons having his or their title. But in case such payments be not made this agreement ceases and determines as hereinbefore provided."

The suit is brought to recover the first payment mentioned in the contract, which was duly demanded soon after May 1, 1888. "At the time it appeared by the evidence that the sum of twelve hundred and fifty dollars was paid to the plaintiff at or about the time of the execution of the contract, by one Edwin S. Thayer, and at the same time, or shortly after, the plaintiff paid two hundred and fifty dollars of this sum to the defendant Hill, in pursuance of a verbal agreement had by the plaintiff and defendant before the time of the execution of the contract; and that in all the negotiations between the plaintiff and defendant concerning the making of the contract, the plaintiff insisted on a payment being made to him at the time of the execution of the contract, and the payment was made at such time in pursuance of this agreement which was not contained in the contract; and by such agreement it was understood that twelve hundred and fifty dollars should be paid to the plaintiff at the time of the delivery of the contract, and that two hundred and fifty dollars of that money should be paid back by the plaintiff to the defendant Hill." It also appeared that at the time the contract was made the wire had not been manufactured for the market, nor put to any use except for the purpose of testing its mechanical and electrical qualities, and there was uncontradicted evidence that the plaintiff had been, for some years before the execution of the contract, trying to get someone to undertake the manufacture of the wire, and that on one occasion previously he had had a contract with the defendant, concerning the purchase of the patents, which had run out.

The question before the court is, What is the true construction of the contract in regard to the payments mentioned in it. Was it an absolute sale, and did the defendant become bound absolutely to pay the sum of $250,000, or was it a contract which merely secured him rights in the patents on his making payments from time to time so long as he continued to pay in accordance with the contract. The defendant contends that the purpose of the contract was to enable the defendant to experiment with the patents and to endeavor to obtain a purchaser of them, and that the payment of $1,250 by Thayer, who testified that he was interested in the purchase of the patents, was to secure to the defendant rights in them for one year, and that at the end of the year he had his option either to pay $2,500 within sixty days after a demand by the plaintiff, and thereby secure control of the patents for another year, or to decline to pay, and so make the contract "void and of no effect."

There can be no doubt that his failure to make the payment demanded terminated all his rights in the patents and his liability for future payments. If such a failure had occurred several years later, after some of the payments had been made, it would have rendered the contract of no effect from the date—that is to say, so far as the contract had been completely executed in the making of payments it would remain in effect, but so far as it remained entirely executory it would be terminated and none of the payments provided for in the future could be collected. The only question of difficulty relates to the payment which had become due, either absolutely or conditionally, but remained unpaid. As to that, is the contract in force so that it can be invoked for the collection of it? That depends on whether the payment had become absolutely due and payable before the contract became void.

It is worth while to inquire whether the parties intended this provision for the benefit of the defendant as well as the plaintiff. Was the defendant entitled to be free from all future liability by refusing to pay on demand, or could the plaintiff if he saw fit compel him to pay the whole sum of $250,000? The stipulation is absolute that on the defendant's failure to pay within sixty days after a demand the contract shall become of no effect for the future; and, considering the nature of the contract, we cannot doubt that the parties intended to allow the defendant to avail himself of this provision at the end of any year to relieve himself from future liability. This the plaintiff's counsel concedes in argument; but he says that the defendant could not relieve himself from liability for the payment which had been demanded, and which he contends had become absolutely payable on the first day of May. But the contract becomes void only after the expiration of sixty days from the plaintiff's demand for the payment; and if the plaintiff's construction were correct, following literally the terms of the contract, he would have nothing to do but to decline to make a demand, and at the expiration of a year the second payment would become due, and at the expiration of another year with no demand the third would become absolutely due, and so on, while the defendant would have no way of avoiding an absolute liability for the whole. To hold that each payment becomes absolutely due on the first day of May, when the contract says it shall be paid, is equivalent to holding that this provision of the contract is for the plaintiff only, and that the defendant has no option if the plaintiff sees fit to hold him as an absolute purchaser.

If we look critically at the contract we notice that the stipulation for a payment on the first day of May in each year is only one of the "conditions of sale," and is qualified by the clause beginning, "it being understood and provided." When we look at the subject matter of the contract, the situation of the parties, the apparently experimental nature of the transaction, and the payment made by the defendant in advance, we think the parties intended that each payment should be made only in case the defendant wished to keep the contract in force for his benefit, and that he was to have sixty days after a demand in which to determine whether to pay or to allow the contract to become void except as to those parts which had been fully executed. If he failed to pay, the contract would become of no effect as to the payment demanded. This appears also by the last paragraph of the contract, which gives the defendant a right to assign "the agreement, subject to all the conditions of payment, to any person or corporation" and to be relieved from further personal liability upon it by substituting another in his place. On such an assignment the assignee would be under no direct obligation to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff would have no remedies under the contract except as it gives him security on the patents. Yet it is stipulated that on payment by such assignee or his assigns or successors in interest "at or before the conclusion of any calendar year," etc., the sale provided for by the contract shall inure to his or their benefit. But if the payment be not made the agreement ceases and determines as before provided. Under this provision it is clear that, if the contract should be assigned, the plaintiff could not recover a payment which should subsequently accrue and be demanded of the assignee; and the contract assumes that this part of it is identical in legal effect with that on which this suit is brought.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the exceptions to the ruling at the trial should be sustained.

In passing on the demurrer to the declaration we are obliged to consider the question presented without the benefit of the facts proved at the trial, and the solution of it is not easy. But in the contract itself, although it does not appear that the payment was made in advance, there is much to show the experimental nature of the transaction. The principal patents had been in existence about three years, as appears by the description of them, and one application for a patent was then pending, and the contract by the terms looked to future inventions to be made and patents to be obtained by the plaintiff which were to be assigned to the defendant. Then the provision for assignment by the defendant "to any person or corporation," and the stipulation that a payment of $100,000 at any time within two years might stand instead of $250,000 to be paid year by year, indicate that this was not considered an absolute sale with security back to the seller, but a grant of a privilege to be kept alive by annual payments, or lost on the failure to pay annually. We are of opinion that the demurrer should be sustained.

Exceptions sustained. Demurrer sustained.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Benjamin WOLF et al.

(.....Mich.....)

1. An assignment preferring some creditors whom it fails to specify either in the instrument itself or in an indexed schedule is void upon its face.
2. An execution purchaser of land included in an assignment for creditors which is void on its face may have his title quieted against such assignment where the statute at the time of the purchase authorized a levy on lands fraudulently conveyed. It was not necessary for the judgment creditor to seek aid in equity before the sale.

(October 30, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Circuit Court for Osceola County in favor of complainants in a suit brought to quiet title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

Statement by Long, J., in the opinion handed down July 2, 1890, after the first hearing.

The bill is filed in this cause to quiet title to certain lands in Osceola County. The bill avers that complainant is in possession and has the original or government title, and also has certain tax titles, and that certain conveyances to the defendant, and claims made by him, cloud the title. On the hearing in the court below the tax titles asserted by each party were admitted to be void, and the only controversy here arises under the original title. All the lands in question were patented by the United States to Dennis Robinson under two patents dated, respectively, November 8 and December 15, 1855. October 5, 1857, Dennis Robinson made a deed of assignment conveying these and other lands, and all his property, real and personal, the lands being specifically described, to Nelson Robinson and George H. White of Grand Rapids, and Robert R. Robinson, of Newaygo County, this State, in trust for the benefit of creditors. This assignment was signed and acknowledged by all the parties and witnesses, and was recorded October 6, 1857. On March 24, 1859, August Washman recovered a judgment against Dennis Robinson for $683 and costs in the Circuit Court for Newaygo County. March 23, 1859, Mr. Washman sold and assigned in writing this judgment and claim against Dennis Robinson to William S. Utley, who was then the clerk of that court. August 12, 1859, Utley issued an execution to the sheriff of Newaygo County to collect the Washman judgment. This execution was returned and filed November 1, 1859, by Utley. December, 1859, Utley issued another execution to the sheriff of Mecosta County, Osceola County, forming a part of Mecosta County at that time. By virtue of this execution the sheriff of Mecosta County levied upon the lands in question and other lands. The execution on March 10, 1860, was returned satisfied in full by sale of these lands. Mr. Utley bought in the lands in question under this execution sale. August 28, 1871, Utley conveyed the lands to Delos A. Blodgett and James Kennedy, by deed of quitclaim, for a consideration of $500; and on June 3, 1874, Blodgett purchased Kennedy's interest therein, taking a quitclaim deed; the consideration being named as $500. The defendant claims under the following chain of title: (1) The assignment from Dennis Robinson to Nelson Robinson, Robert R. Robinson, and George H. White, dated October 5, 1857; Mr. Nelson Robinson, the other assignee, having died in January, 1888. Deed of warranty from Dennis Robinson to him (William O'Connor), dated December 23, 1887, consideration $1, conveying one-half interest in these and other lands, subject to taxes and tax titles. Deed of quitclaim from Robert R. Robinson and George H. White, trustees, etc., dated January 28, 1888, to Dennis Robinson, consideration therein $1; and also warranty deed from Dennis Robinson to him (William O'Connor) conveying all the lands, dated March 4, 1889, for a consideration therein expressed of $50. About the time of the filing of the bill in the present case, two other bills were also filed against the defendant, William O'Connor, one by Henry O.

NOTE.—Recitals of the assignment.

The principal case was decided upon well-recognized rules of law. These rules require that the instrument creating the assignment must itself fix and determine the rights of the creditors in the assigned property. Preferred creditors must be named, and, generally, it may be said that the omission of any of the statutory formulas is a vice which will avoid the instrument. The debtor cannot reserve to himself or transfer to his assignee the right to declare future preferences, or to change the order of the preferences already given, or to give preference at the assignee's discretion. Grover v. Wakeman, 11 Wend. 187; Boardman v. Halliday, 10 Paige, 223, 228, 4 L. ed. 953, 956; Van Nest v. Yoe, 1 Sandf. Ch. 4, 7 L. ed. 216; 2 Kent, Com. (532) 601, note; Kerchels v. Schloss, 49 How. Pr. 268.

Assignments containing provisions to this effect have been repeatedly held fraudulent and void. Barnum v. Hempstead, 7 Paige, 568, 4 L. ed. 278; Boardman v. Halliday, supra; Sheldon v. Dodge, 4 13 L. R. A.

Denio, 217; Strong v. Skinner, 4 Barb. 546; Averill v. Loucks, 6 Barb. 470; Mitchell v. Stiles, 13 Pa. 306; Gazzam v. Poyntz, 4 Ala. 374; Burrill, Assignm. 3d ed. § 179.

In the case of Wakeman v. Grover, 4 Paige, 41, 3 L. ed. 384, the New York Court of Chancery decided that a debtor could not put his property beyond the reach of his creditors at law by assigning it to trustees to pay debts, without settling the rights of creditors under the assignment, leaving it to the assignees to give such future preferences in payment as they might deem proper.

It is a familiar rule on the subject of preferences that the debtor must declare such preferences in the assignment and there should be no power reserved to him by the assignment to interfere with the distribution of the property, and no means or opportunity reserved to him in any way, nor for any length of time, after the execution of the instrument, to make preferences among his creditors, or to use the assignment as a means of extorting terms from them. Kerchels v. Schloss, 49 How. Pr. 284.

Bevier, and the other by William F. Seeley. These other two cases presented by these bills were heard in the court below at the same time with the present case, and the evidence, under the stipulation of counsel, was to be treated as taken in all the cases. Decree was entered in the court below granting the prayers of the bills, and declaring the trust deed void, and a cloud upon the title of the several complainants; the other complainants having derived their titles also through the execution sale to Utley. The tax deeds held by defendant were also declared void. The decree provided that the defendant should release to complainants his claims to said premises, and, in default, that the decree stand in lieu of such conveyance, and be recorded for such purpose. From these decrees the defendant appealed, and all three cases are heard as one in this court. The whole question hinges upon the validity of this trust-deed, as it appears that none of the complainants, except possibly Mr. Bevier, has been in actual possession and occupancy the time required by the statute to settle his title by adverse possession.

It is the claim of the complainants, (1) that the trust deed was never accepted, and that the assignment was never acted upon by the parties, and was never operative; (2) that the instrument is void upon its face. The testimony was taken in open court, and the court below found with the complainant upon these two propositions. These facts are controverted by the defendant. Defendant's contention is, (1) that the complainants cannot assert in a court of equity a title procured through an execution sale; (2) that the trust deed conveyed the estate and title to the trustees, and it was so vested in the trustees at the time of the levy and sale under the execution; (3) that, the title being conveyed to Dennis Robinson by the trustees, the defendant procured an absolute title to the premises under his deeds. The complainant fails to point out the reason for his assertion that the deed of assignment is void on its face. It purported to convey the whole of the property of the assignor for the use and benefit of his creditors. It was executed prior to our Statute regulating the manner of making and execution of assignments for the benefit of creditors. It was signed and acknowledged by the assignors, as well as the assignees, and placed upon record in the office of the register of deeds of the County of Mecosta, where the assignor and one of the assignees resided, and in which the lands in controversy here were situate. Upon its face, it was not void, but a valid conveyance of all the property of Dennis Robinson to Nelson Robinson, Robert R. Robinson, and George H. White for the benefit of the creditors of the assignor. At the time of its execution, it appears that Washman, under and through whose judgment the complainants now claim to hold the property, was a creditor of Dennis Robinson, and after the execution of the trust deed, those claiming under his judgment called upon the assignees for payment of the claim. Washman, Utley, nor any other of the creditors, appear to have moved to set the deed of conveyance aside, but, after the lapse of two years and more from the time the deed was recorded, and while the title of record stood in the trustees, levied upon and sold the land under an execution directed against the assignor. There is an abundance of evidence contained in the record showing that the assignees never acted, or attempted to execute the trust. It appears that, after the deed of assignment was recorded, the assignor continued to control the personal property assigned, of which there was about $2,000, consisting of horses, wagons, harnesses, and lumbering outfits, etc.; that it was disposed of by someone, or spirited away, and no creditor was ever paid a dollar, so far as here shown. It also appears that the assignor afterwards gave deeds of conveyance of a portion of the lands described in the deed of assignment, and did other acts showing that he still claimed an interest in and control over the property. It also appears that certain of the creditors called upon the assignees, or some of them, and demanded payment of their claims, and that they denied any interest in the property; and stated expressly that they never had anything to do with it, and should not, so far as the execution of the trust was concerned. The legal title to these lands, however, conveyed by the trust deed, remained in the assignees, and the survivor of them, until the execution of the deed of quitclaim of January 28, 1888, by White and Robert R. Robinson, the surviving assignees, to Dennis Robinson. So that, at the time of the levy and sale of the lands under the Utley execution the legal title stood in the assignees, and not in Dennis Robinson. Washman and Utley had notice by the record of this deed that the legal title had gone out of Dennis Robinson, and the testimony shows that they had actual notice of that fact; yet they levied upon and sold the land as the property of Dennis Robinson, without any proceeding for the enforcement of the trust, or to set it aside as fraudulent. Utley then stood in the position of purchaser under execution sale of whatever interest Dennis Robinson had in the premises at the time of the levy. As we have seen, he at that time did not have the legal title; and, whatever the attitude of Dennis Robinson or of the assignees towards the property may have been thereafter, or the refusal of the assignees to act under and carry out the terms of the trust would not operate to reconvey the title to the realty to Dennis Robinson. The creditors have the right to its enforcement, as the assignees had accepted the trust in writing, acknowledged its execution, and placed the same of record.

Messrs. Cahill & Ostrander for appellant.

Mr. C. H. Rose, with Mr. G. A. Wolf, for appellees:

If the assignment substantially reserves the right to name the preferred creditors in the future it is fraudulent and void.

Averill v. Loucks, 6 Barb. 470; Bump, Fraud. Conv. 3d ed. 382.

The law requires that the assignment must itself fix and determine the rights of the creditors in the assigned property. Otherwise it places the creditors in the power of the debtor and compels them to acquiesce in such terms as the debtor may think proper to prescribe as the only conditions upon which they are permitted to participate in his property. This is a fraud upon the creditors, and necessarily delays and hinders them in the collection of their debts.

The law prior to 1867 did not require a bill to be filed at all.

Cleland v. T aylor, 3 Mich. 201; Trask v. Green, 9 Mich. 368; Jenison v. Rankin, 57 Mich. 49.

The law in this State at that time followed the common-law rule that the purchaser at the sale could bring ejectment or file a bill.

Bump, Fraud. Conv. 3d ed. 546; Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 126. See Remington Paper Co. v. O'Dougherty, 81 N. Y. 481.

Every equity in this case is in favor of complainants.

It was the duty of the assignees, if they had accepted the trust, to proceed without delay in the premises.

Clark v. Craig, 29 Mich. 398.

The great lapse of time and the acquiescence of all parties interested in the sheriff's sale, made in 1860, will preclude defendant from now attacking complainant's rights thereunder.

Montgomery v. Merrill, 18 Mich. 388.

Messrs. Uhl & Crane, also for appellees:

The complainants are entitled to the same relief against the assignment upon the ground that it was made to defraud the creditors of the assignor as the judgment creditor had either before or after the execution sale.

Champlin, Ch., J., delivered the opinion of the court:

We granted a rehearing in this case upon the application of the complainants, and the case has again been submitted to us for our consideration. The opinion handed down by us is reported in 83 Mich. 301. One of the points made upon the original hearing was that the instrument was void upon its face. In the opinion handed down we said that the complainants had failed to point out the reason of their assertion that the deed of assignment was void upon its face; but in their motion for a rehearing they have stated the grounds upon which this claim is made, and to which our attention is now challenged. It is claimed that the assignment is void upon its face, because it declares preferences in favor of certain creditors, and such preferred creditors are not named either in the body of the instrument or in a schedule attached thereto. For a statement of the claim made by the complainants and of the chain of title of the respective parties reference is made to our former opinion.

It appears from the testimony that at the time of the assignment Robinson was considerably indebted to different persons, and was unable to pay them, and executed an assignment purporting to be for the benefit of all his creditors, with certain preferences, hereinafter more particularly referred to. The contest here is not between creditors claiming any benefit under the deed seeking to enforce an execution of the trust, but complainants claim through a creditor acting in defiance of the title of the trustees. The defendant is not a creditor, and does not claim title through the trustees in the execution of their trust. The bill charges that the deed of assignment was executed to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. Patent proof of such intention is shown by the fact that the assignees never took any steps to enforce the trust, never took possession or control of the property, never sold it in execution of the trust, and never paid a creditor of the assignor. The creditor under whom the complainant claims title, instead of acquiescing in or recognizing the validity of the assignment, proceeded to judgment, and levied execution upon the lands as the property of Dennis Robinson. The property was sold under such execution levy, the sheriff's deed executed, and it has passed through successive purchasers; and for more than twenty-nine years this action has remained unchallenged by either party to the assignment, or by any creditor of Robinson. The testimony shows conclusively that the assignment was a mere formality, executed with the intention of defrauding, delaying, and defeating creditors of Dennis Robinson. Two, at least, of the assignees asserted as early as 1859 that they had never accepted the assignment, and never had done anything under it, and never should; and Dennis Robinson himself directed the assignee of the judgment, who obtained the title under the sheriff's sale, to convey the title which he so obtained to a parcel of the land to Mr. Ryan, in payment of a debt due from Robinson to Ryan.

The assignment refers to a schedule of creditors who were preferred in the instrument. No schedule of creditors accompanies the instrument, and it does not appear that any was ever prepared or furnished to the assignees. It was an imperfect instrument when delivered, and two of the grantees named in it stated that they never had accepted it; and if it can be said that they did in fact accept the instrument in writing by signing their names to the instrument as recorded, still it cannot be said that they ever accepted a complete assignment. The assignment contains this clause: "They shall apply the surplus or residue of said trust moneys in and towards the payment and satisfaction of the several debts and sums of money due to the persons or creditors named in the schedule marked 'A,' as aforesaid, and enumerated in and under class number one, and so marked and indicated; and they, in the successive order in which they relatively stand in said class, to wit, after full payment and satisfaction of the debts due the first (1st), then the residue, if any there be, to be applied to the payment of the second (2d), and then in succession to the third (3d), and that thus successively the whole may be paid as far as the property and effects hereby assigned as aforesaid may or shall be sufficient to pay the same, and, after payment and satisfaction of such last above referred to debts and creditors mentioned in class number one, so marked in said schedule, and of all such costs, charges, and expenses aforesaid, then in trust, that they, or the survivor of them, his executors or administrators, do and shall apply the surplus or residue of said trust moneys in and towards payment and satisfaction of the several debts and sums of money due to the persons or creditors named in said schedule marked 'A,' as aforesaid, and enumerated in and under said class number two, so marked and indicated in said schedule to them pari passu, and without any preference or priority of payment in reference to the order or succession in which they stand in said class." While it will not invalidate an assignment which professes to convey all the assignor's property, and refers therein to a schedule of such property to be annexed, if such schedules are not annexed at the time of the execution of the assignment, yet I have not met with any authority which holds an assignment valid as against non-consenting creditors where the assignor prefers certain creditors over others unless such creditors are specified in the assignment itself, or embraced in a schedule annexed at the time the instrument was executed. The reason is obvious. It cannot be left to the debtor or to the assignees to say what creditors shall be preferred after the assignment is executed. This would leave the door open to the grossest frauds and favoritism. The debtor might sell his favors at a premium, and the assignees would not know at the time they accepted the trust who they were to pay in preference to other creditors of the debtor. Thus, in Averill v. Loucks, 6 Barb. 470: "Where an assignment directed the assignees to pay the debts specified in the schedules annexed thereto according to the priority of the several schedules, and provided that such schedules should be made within sixty days, and be annexed to and form a part of the assignment, but did not prescribe what debts should be inserted in the respective schedules, or in what order they should be arranged therein, the preparation of such schedules being left entirely to the discretion of the assignors, and it appears that such schedules had not been made out and annexed to the assignment previous to its execution, but that they were prepared by the assignors and annexed at some subsequent time, held, that the assignment was fraudulent and void." And Mr. Burrill, in his work on Assignments, at page 280, says: "Where a preference is intended to be indicated by a schedule it must be distinctly shown by some separation of the debt intended to be preferred from the other debts specified. The mere placing of a debt at the head of a schedule is not sufficient; and where an assignment refers to one or more schedules, as fixing the order in which certain preferred creditors shall be paid, it is essential that they should be annexed to the assignment previous to its execution, unless the assignment itself prescribe what debts shall be inserted in them, and in what order." And he cites, in support of what has been quoted, Winslow v. Ancrum, 1 McCord, Eq. 100, and Averill v. Loucks, 6

Barb. 470. See also Barnum v. Hempstead, 7 Paige, 571, 4 L. ed. 279; Boardman v. Halliday, 10 Paige, 227, 4 L. ed. 956; Sheldon v. Dodge, 4 Denio, 221; Hylop v. Clarke, 14 Johns. 462; Kerchels v. Schloss, 49 How. Pr. 284.

It is urged by defendant's solicitor that the complainants are too late in seeking relief against the alleged fraudulent and invalid conveyance; that under the decisions of the court the judgment creditor through whom complainant claims should have filed his bill in aid of his execution before sale; and in support of this position they cite the following: Messmore v. Huggard, 46 Mich. 558; Cranson v. Smith, 47 Mich. 189; Jenison v. Rankin, 57 Mich. 49; Munson v. Ellis, 58 Mich. 335; Edsell v. Nevins, 80 Mich. 146.

If those cases were applicable to the present, I should be loth to follow them where to do so would be to inflict palpable injustice upon the parties who have obtained rights relying upon the decisions and intimations of this court in its reported cases. In Cleland v. Taylor, 3 Mich. 202, the action was ejectment, and the plaintiff relied upon the sheriff's deed, made upon a levy upon land which the plaintiff claimed had been conveyed by defendant with intent to defraud his creditors, and the question raised and decided was that the plaintiff could introduce evidence tending to show that the conveyance was executed with intent to hinder, delay, and defraud the creditors of the defendant in the execution. The presiding judge, at page 206 of the opinion, said: "It is said that a conveyance intended to defraud creditors is not void, but voidable only, at the instance of such creditor. In some respects this is so. As between the parties to the deed it conveys the legal title, which is good also as against the creditor until he pursues his remedy as such creditor, and acquires a lien upon or an interest in the land. When he has done this, the deed is void as to him, and may be treated by him in the prosecution of his remedies as creditor as absolutely void in law as well as in equity. The Statute makes no distinction,"—citing the Revised Statutes, p. 328. And in Trask v. Green, 9 Mich. 368, Mr. Justice Christiancy says: "Where the title before the conveyance has been vested in the debtor himself, and he has conveyed for the purpose of defrauding his creditors, the right of creditors to levy and sell rests upon the ground that, the deed being void as to creditors, the legal title, as to them, still remains in the debtor, as if no conveyance had been made. The land may therefore be sold on execution at law, without invoking the aid of a court of equity; and the purchaser may, if he chooses, try the question of fraud in an action at law (Cleland v. Taylor, 3 Mich. 201, and cases cited); and he may, doubtless, file his bill in a proper case, after sale, to remove the cloud created by the fraudulent conveyance. But it is generally more advantageous to all parties, and therefore more common, for the creditor to bring his bill before sale, in aid of the execution. And this may be done at any time after the creditor has obtained a lien upon the land by his judgment, when that of itself creates the lien, or only after the levy of an execution, where, as in this State, the levy is necessary to give the lien." It is true that what 18 L. R. A.

was thus said by Mr. Justice Christiancy was only the reasoning of the court, but all of the justices of the court concurred in this reasoning, Mr. Justice Campbell so expressly stating. The decisions were not questioned until the case of Messmore v. Huggard, 46 Mich. 558. In that case it was claimed that the mortgage had been executed by the judgment debtor before the levy of execution, which mortgage, it was claimed, was fraudulent and void as to the judgment creditor, and after sale he filed a bill to have the mortgage set aside and discharged as a cloud upon his title. The defendant claimed that the bill should have been filed before sale in aid of execution; and Mr. Justice Cooley, at page 561, said: "The point has never before been distinctly presented in this State, though since the decision in Cleland v. Taylor, 3 Mich. 202, it has perhaps been assumed that the right to question the bona fides of any conveyance by the judgment debtor was as much available to the creditor after he had caused the land to be sold on execution and become the purchaser as it was before. In that case the debtor had made an absolute conveyance, and the creditor, without proceeding to have the conveyance set aside, had become purchaser at the execution sale, and then brought ejectment. The defendant in ejectment questioned the right to inquire into the fraud in a court of law for the purpose of avoiding the deed; but the court, citing and relying upon Jackson v. Myers, 18 Johns. 425; Jackson v. Parker, 9 Cow. 78; Jackson v. Timmerman, 7 Wend. 486, 12 Wend. 299; and Stephens v. Sinclair, 1 Hill, 143,—decided that it was as competent to set aside the fraudulent deed by suit at law as by bill in equity, and that ejectment by the purchaser at the execution sale was a suitable proceeding for the purpose. There are numerous decisions in other States to the same effect, and we do not question their authority. But the case of Cleland v. Taylor, and the others referred to, have little analogy to this. In those cases the judgment debtor had conveyed away his whole interest, and any offer to sell on an execution against him necessarily attacked his conveyance. The judgment debtor would understand this, and his grantee would understand it and take his measures accordingly. So would all persons who should be inclined to become bidders at the sale understand it, and all would stand on an equality with the judgment creditor in making bids. No doubt it would be proper for the sheriff expressly to give notice at the sale that the validity of the debtor's conveyance was disputed; but, as the offer to sell would be idle and meaningless if the conveyance was not contested, any such notice would obviously be unimportant. In this case the situation was altogether different. The judgment debtor had only mortgaged his lands, and an interest remained in him which was subject to execution sale without questioning the mortgage." It is thus seen that Messmore v. Huggard does not overrule Cleland v. Taylor. In Cranson v. Smith, 47 Mich. 189, the bill was filed in aid of execution by a purchaser at the execution sale. The execution debtor had, prior to the levy, executed a quitclaim deed of the premises to his wife, which the complainant alleged was done with the intent to cheat, delay, and defraud his creditors. It was held that the bill in aid of execution must be filed before sale, and could not be afterwards. Mr. Chief Justice Marston distinguishes the case from Cleland v. Taylor and Trask v. Green. It will furthermore be perceived that this case originated since the amendment to the Statute in 1867, by which the practice is regulated. In Jenison v. Rankin, 57 Mich. 49, the court pointed out the distinction which the amendment to the Statute (Sess. Laws 1867, p. 132) made in the remedies to be pursued, and called attention to the fact that Cleland v. Taylor was decided under the Revised Statutes of 1846, and that since the amendment the parties must pursue the remedy provided by the amendment; and this was again announced in Edsell v. Nevins, 80 Mich. 146. The levy and sale were made in this case under the statute authorizing a levy of execution on lands fraudulently conveyed, as such statute read before amendment in 1867, and as it read when the cases of Cleland v. Taylor and Trask v. Green were decided; and so we may say that, if the deed of assignment was valid upon its face, the creditor at that time might attack it by a levy and sale upon the real property as the property of the debtor, and, as pointed out by Mr. Justice Cooley in Messmore v. Huggard, the judgment debtor had conveyed away his whole interest, and any offer to sell on execution necessarily attacked his conveyance. It has never been decided in this State, in cases which arose previous to the amendment of the Statute in 1867, that an execution purchaser cannot attack a conveyance made in fraud of creditors, either in action of ejectment or by bill in equity to remove cloud upon the title. In this case the defendant is not in a position to appeal to the conscience of a court of equity in his behalf. After the lapse of more than twenty-five years, through someone's instigation, the trustees in the deed of assignment, without having attempted to execute the trust, reconveyed in consideration of one dollar the land described in Schedule B to Dennis Robinson, the debtor, who executed the assignment. In this they merely attempted to discharge themselves of the trust, not to execute it. Robinson obtained no right, title, or equity superior to the purchaser at the execution sale against him. Utley was both prior in time and prior in right. Robinson could not successfully contend against the title of the execution purchaser, and O'Connor stands in no better situation than Robinson. I do not consider it necessary to place the decision of this case upon the ground simply that the assignment was executed for the purpose of cheating, delaying, and defrauding creditors, although I think it might safely be rested there, but I place it also upon the ground that the conveyance is void upon its face, and conveyed no title whatever to the grantees, for the reason that it did not contain the names of the creditors preferred, either in the body of the instrument or in the schedule annexed at the time of its execution. If the instrument were a valid one, the defendant in the original and complainant in the cross-bill would not be entitled to the relief here prayed.

If there was a trust which had not been executed by the trustees, he would become trustee by the transfers under which he claims title, 13 L. R. A.

and his title would be subject to the execution of the trust in equity, and he could not be allowed relief without paying the debts for which the assignment was executed; but it is not necessary to consider this branch of the case, as the other is a sufficient answer to his claims for relief, and it follows that the decree of the court below should be affirmed.

Subscribers of money and land to induce a third person to establish a manufactory in a certain community, the entire cost of which is nearly four times the value of the subscriptions, cannot, in the absence of a stipulation as to the time the business shall be continued, maintain an action to recover back their subscriptions, or to enjoin a removal of the machinery; if, after an honest and faithful attempt for two and one half years to render the business a success, it proves a losing venture.

Grant, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complainants, sixteen in number, are residents of the Village of Port Austin. They, together with others, numbering in all one hundred and forty-seven, were desirous of having a flouring-mill built at said village. Conversations took place between some of complainants and the defendant, Henry C. Dutton, who was a practical miller, and then a stranger in that community. The result of these conversations was that Dutton offered to erect a mill of a certain capacity, provided that a bonus of $2,500 was raised by the citizens of the village and vicinity, and sufficient ground given on which to erect the mill. A meeting of citizens was called, and a committee of three was appointed, two of whom are complainants here, to complete the arrangement and attend to the raising of funds. A subscription paper was drawn up, which reads as follows: "In consideration of our mutual promises, and in consideration of and for the purpose of inducing H. C. Dutton to construct a roller-process flouring mill in the Village of Port Austin, Michigan, of seventy-five barrels per day capacity, we severally promise to pay to said H. C. Dutton the sums set opposite our respective names, as follows: Two fifths thereof when the mill building is completed and ready for the machinery, and two fifths thereof when the machinery is delivered at the mill ready to be set up, and the balance when the mill is completed of that capacity and in operation, which shall be February 11, 1888. Dated Port Austin, Mich., this 12th day of September, 1887." The subscriptions amounted to $2,374,

The ground of these decisions as to county seats is that the donors must have given with knowledge of the power to remove the county seat. On the other hand it was said obiter in Twifold v. Alameda County, 4 Greene (La.) 20, that a county should reconvey on removal of a county seat "permanently" located on condition of a conveyance.

Subscribers of money for an educational institution on condition that "it shall locate permanently" in a certain place may have an injunction against its removal. Hascall v. Madison University, 8 Barb. 174.

But unsolicited contributions toward the cost of purchasing a site for a county seat do not give the donors a right to restrain the sale thereof. Warren County v. Patterson, 54 Ill. 111.

A grant in consideration of a railroad company's placing its station on the grantor's land entitles him to damages or the restitution of his land on the removal of the depot one and a half miles away after twenty years. Jessup v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 28 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 583.

And a deed "for a site for a depot . . . to have and to hold . . . for the purpose aforesaid . . . in consideration of the permanent location" of a railroad depot gives a reversion on removal of the depot after eighteen years. Indianapolis, P. & C. R. Co. v. Hood, 66 Ind. 580.

But these cases are much limited by later ones. Thus land conveyed "expressly for the use and purpose of depot grounds," to revert back if the company shall "fail to erect buildings and occupy said ground for that purpose," is held not to revert on a removal of the depot thirty years afterward, there being no express stipulation that such occupancy should be perpetual. Jeffersonville, M. & I. R. Co. v. Barbour, 60 Ind. 375.

Nor is there any reversion of land donated to a railroad company under a contract that it shall "permanently" establish the terminus of its railroad and its main machine works and carworks at that place where after eight years they are removed in whole or in part in accordance with the interests of the public and of the railroad company. Such contract does not amount to a covenant to keep such works there forever. Texas & Pac. R. Co. v. Marshall, 136 U. S. 393, 34 L. ed. 385.

And there is no forfeiture of title to land donated for a tan-yard by discontinuance of its use for that purpose after twenty-four years use. Hunt v. Beeson, 18 Ind. 380.

But an express provision in a deed donating land for depot purposes that it shall revert upon discontinuance of such use is valid and enforceable. Owensboro & N. R. Co. v. Griffith (Ky.) Oct. 17, 1891.

B. A. R.

of which $165 still remains unpaid. Three of the complainants, Frederick, James and Ebenzer Ayres, comprised the firm of Ayres & Co. They deeded the land to Dutton, September 29, 1887, and at the same time Dutton executed an agreement with them by which, among other things, it was provided "that in case said flouring-mill, to be erected upon said lots, should be destroyed by fire within three years, and another flouring-mill of like kind and capacity is not erected upon said lots within said three years, or its erection begun within said three years and completed within a reasonable time thereafter, said Dutton shall deed back said lots to said Ayres and Co.; . . . " or, if he was unable to reconvey, he should pay Ayres & Co. $300 as liquidated damages. These are the only two written documents in connection with the transaction. All else rests in parol.

The defendant, Dutton, erected the mill, according to the terms and specifications, and carried on the business for about two years and a half. The investment was a losing one for him, and, after offering to sell the property to other parties, who are complainants in this suit, at a considerable sacrifice, he sold the machinery, and was proceeding to remove the same, when this bill was filed, and he was enjoined. The original bill set up a bonus of $2,500 paid to Dutton, and prayed that said sum, with interest from the time of payment, be decreed to be paid into court for payment back to the several subscribers; that the complainants Ayres be paid the sum of $300; and that, in default of such payments, the defendants be enjoined from removing the mill. Subsequently complainants filed an amended bill, in which their prayer for specific relief was to enjoin the removal of the mill and its machinery. There was also a general prayer for relief. The court below found that the amounts subscribed were paid upon the equitable and implied consideration that Dutton should erect the mill and operate it with ordinary business skill, and fairly attempt to make the same a profitable and permanent business; that it was not carefully and skillfully conducted; and that it was inequitable towards the subscribers to remove the mill. The decree was for a lien upon the mill and machinery for the amounts paid by complainants, and that until such payments be made defendants be enjoined from removing the machinery. There was no express stipulation, either verbal or written, that Dutton should continue the business for any specified time. The building and plant were erected by Dutton, as agreed upon, at an expense of about $10,500.

1. Complainants have failed to establish a case for the relief asked. Complainant Campbell is in default upon his subscription, and makes no offer to pay the balance due from him. The bill alleges that the agreement was for a bonus of $2,500; that this amount was subscribed and turned over to Dutton, and accepted by him as money. It is now conceded that the whole $2,500 was not raised nor subscribed. It is neither alleged nor proven that Dutton received the subscription pledges as a fulfillment of the agreement on the part of the complainants and their co-subscribers. The demand of complainants, therefore, is in violation of the universal rule that they who ask equity must do equity.

2. It was undoubtedly contemplated by the subscribers, and by Dutton, that the business would be permanent, as the plant itself was permanent in character. It was undoubtedly also contemplated that the business would be successful. Neither party, therefore, thought of making any provision as to time. No bonus would have been subscribed, and Mr. Dutton would not have expended nearly all his means, if any serious doubt of the success of the enterprise had existed. The subscribers to the bonus gave no guaranty. It was a common venture, in which the subscribers staked their bonus of $2,500, and Mr. Dutton the balance, about $8,000. It would be against reason and common sense, under these circumstances, to imply an agreement on the part of Mr. Dutton to continue the business at a loss. We have not before us the case of a successful business under like conditions, and upon such a case we intimate no opinion. It remains, therefore, to determine, from the record presented to us, whether defendant Dutton made a fair and honest effort to render the business a success, so as to warrant its continuance. The business was not successful; and the court below attributed the failure to want of care, skill and attention on the part of Mr. Dutton. There is no charge or evidence of bad faith on his part. He fully complied with his agreement in erecting the mill. He had more at stake and was more deeply interested in the success of the enterprise than any other person. The chief complaint against him is that certain customers who took wheat to the mill did not receive good flour in return, and in some instances received short weights, and that in consequence farmers took their wheat to other mills, or sold it in other places. Several other mills of a like character were doing business not far from this one. Several millers testified in the case, and from the evidence it is at least doubtful whether the complaints against Mr. Dutton in this respect were more common than against millers generally. Several causes operated against Mr. Dutton, which it is not necessary to enumerate. I think the evidence establishes the fact that Mr. Dutton fully complied with his agreement, and made an honest and faithful attempt to render the business a success. Having done this, he was no longer compelled to carry on the business, and had the right to sell and remove the machinery.

3. It follows that the complainants did not by their subscriptions obtain a lien upon the mill plant. There was no express provision for a lien, and none can be implied in such a case as this. It would be most inequitable to hold that Mr. Dutton took all the risks, and, in the event of failure, must pay the subscribers in addition to the large loss which he has incurred.

The decree of the court below is reversed, and bill dismissed, with the costs of both courts.

Sarah F. MEAD, Impleaded, etc., Appt.

(.....N. Y.)

The insertion in a contract for the sale of real estate of a clause binding the vendee to erect certain described buildings on it within a specified time shows the vendor's consent to such erection so as to render his interest in the property liable for liens for labor and material furnished for them, and its effect is not diminished by the insertion in the contract of a stipulation that mechanics' liens shall be subsequent to those of the vendor.

(October 6, 1881.)

APPPEAL by defendant Mead from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the Special Term in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce a mechanics' lien. Affirmed.

Statement by Follett, Ch. J.:

May 25, 1887, the defendant owned in fee land in the City of New York extending from 127th to 128th Street, and bounded on the east by Madison Avenue and on the west by a line drawn parallel with and 35 feet west of the avenue. On the date mentioned she and one NOTE.—New York Mechanics' Lien Law of 1885; legislative intent.

The legislative intent, as disclosed by the judicial interpretation of similar preceding Acts, is "to enlarge the remedy afforded by the former Acts on the same subject." Heckmann v. Pinkney, 81 N. Y. 216; Hackett v. Badeau, 63 N. Y. 478; Loonie v. Hogan, 9 N. Y. 440; Knapp v. Brown, 45 N. Y. 207; Stuyvesant v. Browning, 1 Jones & S. 204; Muldoon v. Pitt, 4 Daly, 104, 54 N. Y. 239.

The principle object is to provide security for a class of persons whose claims gradually accumulate from day to day, and who cannot protect themselves in any other way. As the lien attaches from the outset upon the land as well as upon the improvements, and rests alike upon both, it must be held to remain upon the land after the improvements have been destroyed or removed. Steigleman v. McBride, 17 Ill. 301; Clark v. Parker, 58 Iowa, 508.

The object of the Legislature was not arbitrarily to give a personal privilege to certain persons and refuse it to others, but it was to charge the fund or property which was not by the common law chargeable with the debt. Donaldson v. Wood, 22 Wend. 397.

The lien is to have "an operation somewhat in the nature of an attachment of the fund in the owner's hands." Miller v. Moore, 1 E. D. Smith, 741.

The lien is akin to that given by the common law to artisans upon materials in their possession for labor bestowed on them, and is a favored lien both in law and equity. 2 Kent, Com. 634; Roberts v. Fowler, 3 E. D. Smith, 632.

The Legislature intended altogether to discard the requirements of "a contract, express or implied," on the part of the owner of the land, and to enlarge the remedy of the workman or furnisher of materials in the direction of all cases where the owner of the land should consent to the work, or at all events instigate, or in any way procure it to be done on his land. Burkitt v. Harper, 79 N. Y. 273; Otis v. Dodd, 24 Hun, 538; Loonie v. Hogan, 9 N. Y. 435; Riley v. Watson, 3 Hun, 570; Reno v. Pinder, 20 N. Y. 301; Pierson v. People, 18 Hun, 248; Eckhard v. Donohue, 9 Daly, 214.

In order to confirm this view of the legislative intention, and to ascertain its compass, it is allowable to refer to contemporaneous legislation, although, not precisely in part materia. Chase v. Lord, 6 Abb. N. C. 276.

Judicial construction of the Act.

Under a very recent construction placed upon this Act by the New York Court of Appeals it appears that pears that in an action to foreclose the lien its beneficial effects cannot be defeated by the stipulation as against one not in privity with either of the parties to it, and who, without notice of the stipulation, have furnished labor or material. It was further held that the contract was proof of defendant's consent to the erection of the building and is sufficient to subject the owner's interest to all the incidents of the lien. Miller v. Mead, 127 N. Y. 544.

The Act of 1885 recognizes only the legal ownership, as contra-distinguished from the equitable ownership. Riley v. Watson, 3 Hun, 569; Schmaltz v. Mead, 23 N. Y. S. R. 117; Nellis v. Bellinger, 6 Hun, 560; Hackett v. Badeau, 63 N. Y. 478; Husted v. Mathes, 77 N. Y. 388.

We are at liberty to regard the judicial interpretation of the statutory recitals in a similar preceding law as it is an elementary rule of interpretation that where an Act is of the same general character as the former Act, and is in furtherance of the same general policy, it is subject to the same rules of construction. Turnipseed v. Schaefer, 76 Ga. 109.

Nature and scope of the remedy.

The lien of mechanics and materialmen on buildings and the land upon which they are erected, as security for the amount due them for work done and materials furnished, is the "creation of statute," and was unknown either at common law or in equity. Phillips, Mechanics' Liens, § 1, citing Davis v. Farr, 13 Pa. 167; McNeil v. Borland, 23 Cal. 144; Doellner v. Rogers, 18 Mo. 340; Ayers v. Revere, 25 N. J. L. 474; Spencer v. Barnett, 85 N. Y. 94; South Fork Canal Co. v. Gordon, 73 U. S. 6 Wall. 561, 18 L. ed. 394; McCoy v. Quick, 30 Wis. 521.

Statutes governing mechanics' liens are remedial, and must be liberally construed. Rogers v. Omaha Hotel Co. 4 Neb. 59.

This proceeding is wholly statutory, and, to entitle a claimant to its benefits, the recitals of the enactment must be closely observed; any substantial failure in this respect will avoid the lien and the court has no power or authority to sustain the proceeding, as a compliance with the requirements of the Statute is necessary to confer jurisdiction, and when that is omitted in any essential particular, the benefit designed by the Statute cannot be obtained. Brown v. New York, 6 Thomp. & C. 164; Van Loon v. Lyons, 61 N. Y. 22; Burrows v. Ford, 6 N. Y. 178; People v. Knowles, 47 N. Y. 415.

The State "prescribes the conditions under which a court may act; those conditions cannot be dispensed with by litigants, for in such a case the particular condition or status of the defendant is made a jurisdictional fact." Davidson v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 90 N. Y. 530.

Herman Gierke entered into a written contract by which she covenanted to sell, and he to purchase, the premises for $70,000. Gierke also covenanted to complete, on or before October 1, 1887, six dwelling-houses, then begun on the south part of the lands, in a style specified in the contract, and costing at least $6,000 each. The defendant covenanted to advance Gierke $21,000, payable by installments as the work progressed, to aid in the erection of the buildings. It was mutually covenanted that when the houses were completed the defendant would convey the land to Gierke, and that he, concurrently therewith, would give his bonds to secure the payment of the purchase price, $70,000, and the $21,000 to be advanced, secured by mortgages on the premises. The contract contained the following provision: "And it is agreed that, should any mechanics' lien be filed against the property herein described during the progress of said buildings, or against any part thereof, . . . such mechanics' lien . . . shall be subsequent to the liens and claims of the party of the first part (Sarah F. Mead), but in such cases, or either of them, it is agreed that all payments or advances due or to become due under this contract may, at the option of the party of the first part (Sarah F. Mead), be withheld until such lien or liens shall be removed and discharged of record; or said party of the first part may, at her option, apply such payments or advances to the payment and discharge thereof, or said party of the first part (Sarah F. Mead) may, at her option, in the case of a mechanics' lien, deposit an amount sufficient to cover said lien or liens, or give security

The foundation of a mechanics' lien is an indebtedness existing upon a contract by the person sought to be charged. Tiley v. Thousand Island Hotel Co. 9 Hun, 424; Dixon v. LaFarge, 1 E. D. Smith, 722; Pendleburg v. Meade, 1 E. D. Smith, 728; Quinn v. New York, 2 E. D. Smith, 558; DeRonde v. Olmsted, 47 How. Pr. 175; Knapp v. Brown, 45 N. Y. 207; Gay v. Brown, 1 E. D. Proceedings and judgment under the Mechanics' Lien Law are held to be in personam and not in rem. The lien of the judgment upon the particular property relates back to the time the work, etc., began, but is in other respects a general judgment. An invariable and inseparable quality, etc., of a proceeding in rem is the seizure of the thing, e. g. seizure under an attachment, although such writs issue against the defendants by name. Capelle v. Baker, 3 Houst. (Del.) 344.

Lien governed by the contract with the owner.

A party furnishing materials or doing work, relying upon the lien given by statute for security, must examine the contract with the owner; for it is only to the extent of what is due or to become due upon this contract, that his lien can attach. If he furnishes the material, or does the work for a sub-contractor, in like reliance, he should not only examine the contract with the owner, but also that of the sub-contractor; for, if the sub-contractor fails to perform his contract, so that nothing becomes payable thereon, or is paid in full, according to its terms, in case of performance, there can be no lien within the principle of the decisions in Carman v. McInerow, 13 N. Y. 70; Lumbard v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 55 N. Y. 491; Crane v. Genin, 60 N. Y. 127; Hagan v. American Baptist Home M. Soc. 14 Daly, 131.

To what the lien attaches.

As between the owner and mechanic, everything put into and forming part of a building, or machinery for manufacturing purposes, and essential to the manufactory, is a part of the freehold; as wheels of a mill, the stones and even the bolting-cloth, a copper kettle or boiler in a brewing-house, when proved to be essential to the brew-house, are subject to the Mechanics' Lien Law. Gray v. Holdship, 17 Serg. & R. 418.

So is a cooking range (Reilly v. Hudson, 62 Mo. 383); and a cotton gin placed in a gin-house, Ewell, Fixtures, 296.

So the engine by which a steam saw-mill is propelled is part of the building. Morgan v. Arthurs, 3 Watts, 140.

Likewise mill-stones (Wademan v. Thorp, 5 Watts, 13 L. R. A.

115), and machinery put up for a mill, fastened by screws and bolts. McGreary v. Osborne, 9 Cal. 119.

Under a statute that "every person performing labor upon, or furnishing materials to be used in the construction of, any building, shall have a lien upon the same," mirror-frames set in the wall, fastened by hooks and screws, so they can be removed, but designed by the owner to be permanent and to go with the building when sold, entitle the mechanic to a lien on the building. Ward v. Kilpatrick, 85 N. Y. 413; Phillips, Mechanics' Liens, 2d ed. § 177.

It covers anything used in the construction of the building. Hazard Powder Co. v. Byrnes, 12 Abb. Pr. 469; Henderson v. New York, 32 U. S. 268, 23 L. ed. 547; Kent v. New York Cent. R. Co. 12 N. Y. 631, 632; Phillips, Mechanics' Liens, §§ 3, 48, 153.

When the articles furnished are in fact and in intention annexed to the freehold, so as to become a part of it, and would, as between vendor and vendee pass by deed of the premises without special enumeration, the materialman has performed labor and furnished materials used in altering or repairing a building, or appurtenances thereto, for which he is entitled to a lien under the statute. Ward v. Kilpatrick, 85 N. Y. 413; Voorhees v. McGinnis, 48 N. Y. 278; McRea v. Central Nat. Bank of Troy, 66 N. Y. 489; Laws 1885, chap. 342.

The materials furnished may become so affixed to the realty as to entitle the party furnishing the same to file a mechanics' lien. Ombony v. Jones, 19 N. Y. 235; McRea v. Central Nat. Bank of Troy, 66 N. Y. 489; Dobschuetz v. Holliday, 82 Ill. 371; Gaty v. Casey, 15 Ill. 189, 191; Grosz v. Jackson, 6 Daly, 463.

A lien lies for the flagging laid on the sidewalk in front of a building. McDermott v. Palmer, 8 N. Y. 387; Moran v. Chase, 52 N. Y. 346.

Who are within the Act.

The several Mechanics' Lien Acts of this State unite in making the privilege of a lien as broad as language can frame it. "Every person" says the New York City Act, "Any person," say the other Acts, who performs labor or furnishes materials by the "request" (N. Y. City Act), "consent" (State Act), or "permission" (Kings Co. Act), of the owner, may have a lien. Construing this language strictly, there is no limit to the right so far as parties are concerned. Unfortunately for this simple construction, the term "Any person" is not always construed literally (Freethy v. Freethy, 42 Barb. 641). It only covers those persons whom it is reasonable to presume the Legislature intended to be designated, and who are capable, legally and physically, of coming within its terms. Kneeland, Mechanics' Liens, 2d ed. § 2.

The word "contractors," as used in the Act, is to be understood to embrace all who employ "laborers" in the construction of the work, whether they under the Statute, and contest the same at the cost and expense of the party of the second part (Herman Gierke), and deduct the same from said payments or advances; and the said party of the first part (Sarah F. Mead) expressly reserves the right to make the said payments or advances, or any part of the said payments or advances, before they, or either of them, may be due and payable, or out of the order in which they, or either of them, may become due and payable." June 9, 1887, Gierke, with the assent of Sarah F. Mead, assigned the contract to Edward Grippentrog. On the 20th of June, 1887, David Miller (the plaintiff), and Grippentrog entered into a written contract by which Miller contracted to furnish stone for the completion of the buildings for $9,060, under which, prior to January 24, 1888, the plaintiff furnished stone of the value of $1,500; and, the price thereof not being paid, a lien was filed on the 24th of January, 1888, pursuant to chapter 342 of the Laws of 1885, to foreclose which this action was brought. Upon the trial the court found that the plaintiff had furnished under the contract stone used in the buildings of the value of $1,500, which was adjudged to be due, and a judgment was entered foreclosing the lien, with costs; from which the defendant appealed to the general term, where it was affirmed, and thereupon the defendant appealed to this court.

Mr. E. N. Taft for appellant.

Mr. William E. Stewart, with Mr. James T. Hoyt, for respondent:

It was the design of the Statute to charge be original or sub-contractors. So, too, the word "laborers," in contra-distinction to the word "contractors," is intended to include such persons as upon the employment of contractors actually engage in the construction of the work. Warner v. Hudson River R. Co. 5 How. Pr. 454.

An architect has been held to come within the protection of the statute and his work is as much entitled to the designation of labor and services as that of carpenters, masons or plumbers. Knight v. Norris, 18 Minn. 473-476; Bank of Pennsylvania v. Gries, 35 Pa. 423-426; Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Rowand, 26 N. J. Eq. 389, 397; Conant v. VanSchaick, 24 Barb. 87; Hovey v. Tenbroeck, 3 Robt. 816; Vincent v. Bamford, 12 Abb. Pr. N. S. 252; Jones & S. 506, 510; Coffin v. Reynolds, 37 N. Y. 640-642; Ericsson v. Brown, 38 Barb. 390; 1 Domat, Civ. Law, by Strahan, §§ 1736, 1744; Aikin v. Wasson, 24 N. Y. 482; Richardson v. Abendroth, 43 Barb. 162, 298, 299; Gurney v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co. 58 N. Y. 368, 367, 371; Williamson v. Wadsworth, 49 Barb. 294; Mulligan v. Mulligan, 18 La. Ann. 20-22; Capron v. Strout, 11 Nev. 304, 310.

Labor upon a building and materials used in its construction are the test of the lienor's right. In other words, the work and the materials, both in fact and in intention, must have become part and parcel of the building itself. Ward v. Kilpatrick, 85 N. Y. 413.

The law is solicitous for all parties who are within the Act and where a right of lien has been created and no express waiver of this right is shown, the law is reluctant to imply a waiver of that right. Payne v. Wilson, 74 N. Y. 848.

Sub-contractor or materialman.

In order to entitle a sub-contractor or materialman to a judgment against the owner, he must show either that at the time of the creation of the lien, by the filing of the notice, a debt was actually owing from the owner to the contractor, or else that the same subsequently became due and owing. Smith v. Coe, 2 Hilt. 365; Ferguson v. Burk, 4 E. D. Smith, 700; Lynch v. Cashman, 3 E. D. Smith, 660; Sullivan v. Brewster, 1 E. D. Smith, 682. See also Schneider v. Hobeln, 41 How. Pr. 232.

A sub-contractor or materialman can acquire a lien to the extent of the sum due from the owner to the contractor at the time of filing the lien. Gibson v. Lenane, 94 N. Y. 183.

It is not the duty of the contractor to hunt up everyone who may have worked for or furnished materials to a sub-contractor, and ascertain whether they have been paid, but it is the duty of such persons to give the contractor the notice required by law in order to bind him. French v. Bauer, 32 N. Y. S. R. 326.

Upon proof of the indebtedness and of the facts as to filing the notice, the question as to the liability is L. R. A.

ty of the owner becomes a question of law. Smith v. Coe, 29 N. Y. 686. See note to Schroeder v. Galand (Pa.) 7 L. R. A. 711.

Term "owner" defined.

The word "owner," in statutes relating to mechanics' liens, is construed to mean the owner of the legal title, the vendor before the actual conveyance of the land, and not the vendee under a contract for conveyance. Thaxter v. Williams, 14 Pick. 49; Lamb v. Cannon, 38 N. J. L. 362; Metcalf v. Hunnewell, 1 Gray, 297; Hayes v. Fessenden, 106 Mass. 228; Guy v. Carriere, 5 Cal. 511; Johnson v. Pike, 35 Me. 291; Steinmetz v. Boudinot, 3 Serg. & R. 541.

Consent of owner sufficient.

However manifested, the consent of the owner to the erection of the house is sufficient to give persons furnishing labor or materials a mechanics' lien. Husted v. Mathes, 77 N. Y. 898; Nellis v. Bellinger, 6 Hun, 560.

Consent implies a degree of superiority, at least the power of preventing; it implies not merely that a person accedes to, but authorizes, an act. Crabbe's Synonyms; Ottwell v. Watkins, 15 Daly, 308.

It is synonymous with "permission." Hackett v. Badeau, 63 N. Y. 476.

Such consent may be implied by the acts and declarations of the owner, and such implied consent is operative to the same extent as if he contracted directly for the improvements. Otis v. Dodd, 90 N. Y. 336. See Ross v. Simon, 30 N. Y. S. R. 545.

The knowledge and approbation of the work by the owner are sufficient to subject her interest in the land to the operation of the lien. Hellwig v. Blumenberg, 28 N. Y. S. R. 75.

There is an implied consent of the owner to furnish necessary labor and materials where he leases the land and agrees that his tenant may make improvements thereon, which are to become his property at the end of the term. Burkitt v. Harper, 79 N. Y. 273.

But under a prior Statute (Act of 1875), it was held that where the owner, during the running of the lease, approved of certain improvements made by the lessee, he did not thereby subject his interest to a lien thereon on the ground of consent. Jones v. Manning, 25 N. Y. S. R. 771. See Craig v. Swinerton, 8 Hun, 144.

Where the owner contracted with a building company to erect a building, and the company ordered certain equipments, and the owner, with the company's consent, ordered larger and more expensive equipments as a substitute on his own responsibility, his interest was subjected to a lien therefor. Richardson & B. Co. v. Reid, 3 N. Y. Supp. 224.

The knowledge of a married woman that im-the land with debts contracted in improving it, in case the owner consented to or permitted the work to be done, although under a contract made with the vendee.

Rollin v. Cross, 45 N. Y. 766; Burkitt v. Harper, 79 N. Y. 278; Otis v. Dodd, 90 N. Y. 836.

Where an owner of land agrees to sell it, and advances money with which to build upon the premises sold, and after completion of the houses the builder is to secure the purchase price and the advances by mortgages, the person who agrees to purchase builds by permission of the owner (Hart v. Wheeler, 1 Thomp. & C. 408), and the property is charged with a lien until the deed is actually delivered without regard to the terms of the contract of purchase.

Improvements are being made on her lands by her husband, where she interposes no objection, is an implied consent to their construction. Husted v. Mathes, 77 N. Y. 389.

Lien not assignable.

A mere inchoate right to a mechanics' lien is not assignable. Such lien passes with an assignment of the debt only where it has been perfected under the Statute. Goodman v. Penoe, 21 Neb. 459.

A contractor cannot at any time during the progress of the work assign all his claim to a third party, so as to deprive the sub-contractor of all the benefits afforded him by the Statute. Bourget v. Donaldson, 88 Mich. 478.

The lien under statutes of this character is, in general, a personal right given to the mechanic, materialman and laborer, for his own protection, and the right to create it cannot be assigned or transferred to another (Daubigny v. Duval, 5 T. R. 604; Caldwell v. Lawrence, 10 Wis. 332; Pearsons v. Tincker, 36 Me. 384), unless the assignment is made for the benefit of the assignor, and to be held as his agent, so that the lien may be preserved. Urquhart v. Molver, 4 Johns. 102; McComble v. Davies, 7 East. 5. See note to Farmers Loan & T. Co. v. Canada & St. L. R. Co. (Ind.) 11 L. R. A. 740.

But after the lien has been filed by the original creditor, or if the assignee files it in the name of the assignor, or if the assignment is made for the benefit of the assignor, the assignee may afterwards foreclose it, either in his own name as assignee, or in the name of the assignor as his agent. Hullaban v. Herbert, 11 Abb. Pr. N. S. 326; Rollin v. Cross, 45 N. Y. 766; Palmer v. Merrill, 6 Cush. 232.

Notice to be filed.

While conceding that this statute gives a remedy, and is to be liberally and beneficially construed, it does not follow that a construction can be admitted under that rule which will impose a lien, unless the terms of the Statute have been complied with by filing the notice within the prescribed period. Spencer v. Barnett, 35 N. Y. 94.

One entitled to a mechanics' lien, until he files his notice, has no greater equities than other general creditors, and is affected by all equities existing at that time in favor of those dealing with his debtor. His lien attaches only to the estate and interest of the debtor as it then exists. His lien is subject to a prior equitable lien although he had no notice of it. Payne v. Wilson, 74 N. Y. 348.

The notice should state, among other things, the "situation of the building by its street and number, if the number be known." Duffy v. McManus, 3 E. D. Smith, 657.

That the owner of the soil had personal or actual knowledge that the work was being done need not be stated in the notice of a mechanics' lien. Jewell v. McKay, 82 Cal. 144.

Gates v. Whitcomb, 4 Hun, 187. See Nellis v. Bellingier, 6 Hun, 560; Husted v. Mathes, 77 N. Y. 388; Riley v. Watson, 8 Hun, 569; Hackett v. Baderv, 63 N. Y. 476; Schmaltz v. Mead, 28 N. Y. S. R. 117.

Follett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is provided by chapter 342 of the Laws of 1885 (the General Mechanics' Lien Law of this State), as follows: "Section 1. Any person . . . who shall hereafter perform any labor or service, or furnish any materials which have been used, or which are to be used, in erecting, altering, or repairing any house, . . . with the consent of the owner, as hereinafter defined, or his agent, or any contractor or subcontractor, or any other person contracting with such

If enough appears in the description of the property in the notice filed to enable a party familiar with the locality to identify the premises sought to be described with a reasonable degree of certainty, the description will be held sufficient. Scholes v. Hughes, 77 Tex. 482; Northwestern Cement & C. Pav. Co. v. Norwegian D. E. L. A. Sem. 43 Minn. 442; Brown v. Wright, 25 Mo. App. 54; Duffy v. McManus, supra.

The notice of a mechanics' lien need not state in so many words that the lien is claimed against the persons named; but if the names are given, and the facts subjecting their interest to the lien are stated, the statute is satisfied. Ross v. Simon, 30 N. Y. S. R. 545.

The lien which a contractor acquires by filing a notice with the county clerk attaches only to the legal right, title and interest of the owner, then existing. If, previous to the filing of such notice, the owner has parted with his interest in the property, no lien is acquired. Ernst v. Reed, 49 Barb. 367.

Under a statute requiring the verification of a notice of mechanics' lien to be that the statements therein are true to the knowledge or information and belief of the person making it, a verification stating that such statements are true to his knowledge, information and belief is sufficient. Kealey v. Murray, 15 N. Y. Supp. 403.

The New York Lien Law of 1862, chap. 478, applicable to Kings County, which does not require verification of notice of lien, is not repealed by N. Y. Laws 1880, chap. 486, for cities of the State generally, requiring such verification. Graf v. Cunningham, 12 Cent. Rep. 302, 109 N. Y. 369.

The filing of the notice within the period of statutory limitation is absolutely necessary, and without it the claim is totally void. Hubbell v. Schreyer, 14 Abb. Pr. N. S. 284; Donaldson v. O'Connor, 1 E. D. Smith, 696; Tiley v. Thousand Island Hotel Co. 9 Hun, 424; Scott v. Cook, 8 Mo. App. 123; Duffy v. Baker, 17 Abb. N. C. 357; Spencer v. Barnett, 35 N. Y. 94; Lutz v. Ey, 3 E. D. Smith, 627; Gates v. Buddensick, 6 Abb. N. C. 397; Danziger v. Simonson, 21 Jones & S. 138; Barrows v. Knight, 55 Cal. 155; Dart v. Fitch, 23 Hun, 361.

The lien is fatally defective in failing to state whether all the work for which it was filed was actually performed or furnished. Luscher v. Morris, 18 Abb. N. C. 67.

A certified copy of the notice of lien filed, as here, in provided, shall be entitled to be read in evidence with the same force and effect as if the original were provided, and such copy shall be prima facie evidence of the execution and filing of the original. Laws 1885, chap. 342, § 8.

Proof of notice.

The essential facts, and the burden of proof, depend upon the statute. The notice of lien is not owner, to erect, alter, or improve, as aforesaid, within any of the cities or counties of this State, may . . . have a lien for the principal and interest of the price and value of such . . . material upon such house . . . and upon the lot . . . upon which the same may stand or be intended to stand, to the extent of the right, title, and interest at that time existing of such owner, whether owner in fee or of a less estate, . . . or of the owner of any right, title, or interest in such estate, which may be sold under an execution. . . . In cases in which the owner has made an agreement to sell and convey the premises to the contractor or other person, such owner shall be deemed to be the owner, within the intent and meaning of this Act, until the deed has been actually delivered and recorded conveying said premises pursuant to such agreement." Section 5. The parts of the Statute above quoted have been recently construed by the court of appeals in Schmalz v. Mead, 125 N. Y. 188, which affirms 4 N. Y. Supp. 614, the facts of which were as follows: The defendant, the owner in fee of the land involved in the case at bar, contracted in November, 1885, to sell and convey it to George Kuhn for an agreed price, and to advance to the vendee a certain sum in installments to enable him to erect buildings of a kind agreed to thereon. The vendor covenanted that when the buildings were completed he would convey the land, and take the grantee's bond, secured by a mortgage on the land, for the payment of the purchase price, and the sum to be advanced for building purposes. Under this contract, the vendee entered into possession, and began the proved by the county clerk's certified copy (Sampson v. Buffalo, N. Y. & P. R. Co. 4 Thomp. & C. 600); but his certificate proves the filing. Mortgages and others acquiring interest in property against which the lien is claimed have a right to call for strict proof of all that is essential to the creation of the lien, and this includes proof of the commencement of the work, of its character, and of its completion. Davis v. Alvord, 94 U. S. 545, 547, 24 L. ed. 283, 284; Abbott, Tr. Ev. chap. 55.

Performance as a condition precedent.

In a building contract where performance is made a condition of payment, performance must be shown to entitle a party to recover. Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 173, and cases cited.

But when the builder has in good faith intended to and has substantially complied with the contract, although there may be slight defects caused by inadvertence or unintentional omissions, he may recover the contract price, less the damage on account of such defects. Johnson v. DePeyster, 50 N. Y. 666; Glacius v. Black, 50 N. Y. 145.

Literal performance in every detail, according to the specifications, is not required in building contracts. Substantial performance is sufficient to sustain the lien. Sinclair v. Tallmadge, 35 Barb. 602; Smith v. Gugerty, 4 Barb. 614; Smith v. Brady, 17 N. Y. 173; Colwell v. Lawrence, 24 How. Pr. 324; Thomas v. Fleury, 26 N. Y. 32.

Where the evidence shows an abandonment of the contract by the defendant, plaintiff is not required to prove a legal excuse for nonperformance on his part in order to recover on a quantum meruit; and where the time agreed upon for performance has been waived, plaintiff need not notify defendant of his intention to foreclose and demand specific performance of the contract recitals within a reasonable time. Powers v. Hogan, 67 How. Pr. 255.

In an action for labor and material under a contract it is sufficient to show substantial performance; but where a defect in the performance exists the defendant may counterclaim and prove what damage he has sustained by reason of the defect. Phillip v. Gallant, 62 N. Y. 256; Johnson v. DePeyster, 50 N. Y. 666; Vanderbilt v. Eagle Iron Works, 25 Wend. 665.

If the contractor has been induced by the owner to omit performance within the time limited, he would be required to complete the contract with due diligence. Sinclair v. Tallmadge, 35 Barb. 602, 607; Wallman v. Society of Concord, 45 N. Y. 485; Green v. Haines, 1 Hilt. 254; Reed v. Brooklyn Board of Education, 3 Keyes, 106; Leslie v. Knickerbocker L. Ins. Co. 63 N. Y. 27; Ruff v. Rinaldo, 55 N. Y. 664.

There must be no willful or intentional departure, and the defects must not pervade the whole, 13 L. R. A.

or be so essential as that the object which the parties intended to accomplish, to have a specified amount of work performed in a particular manner, is not accomplished. Sinclair v. Tallmadge, 35 Barb. 602.

This is a question of fact, and from the nature of the question it must be so. Phillip v. Gallant, 62 N. Y. 256.

But if it appears that there were departures by mutual consent from the original plan, and, furthermore, that after the time prescribed by the contract had expired the defendant Clark notified plaintiffs to go on and complete, under competent authorities either of these circumstances would operate as a waiver of the time conditioned in the contract. It has also been directly held that in a contract of this character a provision that the work shall be completed by a certain date, and paid for upon completion, does make time of the essence of the contract, and that, if the builder proceeds afterwards with the assent of the other party, he may recover at the contract price. Dillon v. Masterton, 7 Jones & S. 133.

Priority of liens.

The priority as between mechanics' liens and mortgages is largely controlled by statutory enactment in the different States. Cheshire Provident Inst. v. Stone, 52 N. H. 365; Chadbourn v. Williams, 71 N. C. 450; Brooks v. Burlington & S. W. R. Co. 101 U. S. 443, 25 L. ed. 1067; Cal. Code Civ. Proc. § 1186; Shepardson v. Johnson, 60 Iowa, 239; Mass. Gen. Stat. chap. 150; Mellor v. Valentine, 3 Colo. 258; Davis v. Bilsland, 85 U. S. 18 Wall. 659, 21 L. ed. 969.

The first mortgage given in good faith and duly recorded is prior, superior and paramount to a mechanics' lien subsequently filed. Coe v. New Jersey M. R. Co. 81 N. J. Eq. 127, 123; West v. Klotz, 37 Ohio St. 420; 2 Wood. Railway Law, 292; Choteau v. Thompson, 2 Ohio St. 114.

It is the law of Ohio that a mortgage takes effect from the date it is duly filed for record, and this fact controls its priority. Kling v. Ballentine, 40 Ohio St. 391; Bloom v. Noggle, 4 Ohio St. 52; Bercaw v. Cockerill, 20 Ohio St. 163.

In some States the lien attaches from the commencement of the work, although the particular work for which the lien is claimed was done after the execution of the mortgage. Hall v. Hinckley, 32 Wis. 362; Neilson v. Iowa Eastern R. Co. 44 Iowa, 71; Davis v. Alvord, 94 U. S. 545, 24 L. ed. 283; Dubois v. Wilson, 21 Mo. 214; Meyer v. Delaware R. Const. Co. 100 U. S. 457, 25 L. ed. 533; Brooks v. Lester, 3 Md. 65.

To allow the vested rights of third persons, not parties or privies to a contract, to be prejudiced by its terms would be destructive of the rights of property (Brown v. Morison, 5 Ark. 217) and en-erection of the buildings, but soon failed, and abandoned his purchase. The vendor had performed her part of the contract, and no advances were due from her when the lien for materials furnished the vendee was filed or foreclosed. The vendor defended the action to foreclose the lien on the grounds (1) that the contract of sale and for the erection of buildings was not sufficient evidence of the owner's (vendor's) consent, within the statutory meaning of "the consent of the owner" that the buildings be erected; (2) that only the interest of George Kuhn, vendee and contractor could be subjected to lien; (3) that the lien could attirely at variance with the office of a lien, which is not to create an estate, or in the slightest degree affect or interfere with prior incumbrances. Its true function is to prevent subsequent alienations and incumbrances, except in subordination to itself. Watkins v. Wassell, 15 Ark. 73; Spence v. Etter, 8 Ark. 69.

To determine, therefore, priority among different lien-holders, it is only necessary to decide who has the first right or lien, unless it has been displaced by some act of the party holding it, which shall postpone him to subsequent claimants. Parker v. Kelly, 10 Smedes & M. 184; Weller v. McNabb, 4 Sneed, 422; Twelves v. Williams, 3 Whart. 485.

This may be either by agreement of parties, or fraud in its creation. Phillips, Mechanics' Liens, 2d ed. § 225.

The principle may be regarded as established, that an equitable mortgage duly created before the filing of a mechanics' lien has priority over it. Cox v. Broderick, 4 E. D. Smith, 721; Sinclair v. Fitch, 3 E. D. Smith, 677; Noyes v. Burton, 29 Barb. 630; Quimby v. Sloan, 2 E. D. Smith, 594; Cronk v. Whittaker, Id. 647; Lohretter v. Koffman, 1 E. D. Smith, 664; Chamberlain v. O'Connor, Id. 665; Kaylor v. O'Connor, Id. 672; McAuley v. Mildrum, 1 Daly, 366; Bailey v. Johnson, Id. 61; Ernst v. Reed, 49 Barb. 367.

A mortgage duly executed and recorded holds superior equities to that of a mechanics' lien, and the latter will attach only to the equity of redemption. Bayne v. Wilson, 11 Hun, 305, 74 N. Y. 355; Munger v. Curtis, 42 Hun, 465.

Summarizing the principles which underlie this subject of priority, it may be said that if the premises are already incumbered by a mortgage to a bona fide incumbrancer, the claim of the mechanic is subordinate to that of the mortgagee; and this is a well-recognized law governing the subject. Munger v. Curtis, 42 Hun, 465.

Mechanics' lien on lands of married women. See note to Esterbrook v. Riley (Iowa) 10 L. R. A. 33.

Materials must be furnished with knowledge of the wife, to bind her. Ibid.

In such case the husband's agency is a question of fact, and he may be called as a witness to controvert his alleged agency. Robe v. Hese, 118 N. Y. 668.

It has been held that where the contract for the improvements was made expressly with the husband and upon his credit, the wife's consent will not be inferred. Ziegler v. Galvin, 45 Hun, 44.

Discharging the lien.

The lien can be discharged only in one of the modes provided by the Statute. The whole proceeding is a special one, and such remedies only as are given by the Statute can be pursued. A lapse of one year without proceeding discharges the lien; and a more speedy mode of testing its validity may be had by a notice to the claimant to foreclose his lien. The court has not the power to discharge the lien, and the bringing of a suit could not of itself have that effect. Fettrich v. Totten, 2 Abb. Pr. N. S. 264.

On an application to discharge a mechanics' lien for failure by the holder to foreclose after notice, the court must take into consideration the equities of the case, and exercise a sound discretion in 13 L. R. A.

granting or refusing the application. Re Poole, 33 N. Y. S. R. 806.

The purpose of the provisions, allowing the payment of money to the county clerk, is to remove the lien from the lands of the party and impose it upon the money, the object being to enable the owner of real estate, by substituting money to the amount of the alleged lien, to enjoy the power of disposing of his land relieved from the incumbrance. Dunning v. Clarke, 2 E. D. Smith, 535.

The proceeding to foreclose a mechanics' lien is a proceeding in rem, founded on statute, not in personam, and operates only as a foreclosure, and not as an action for the collection of a debt. Randolph v. Leary, 3 E. D. Smith, 387, 4 Abb. Pr. 205; Quimby v. Sloan, 2 E. D. Smith, 606; Cronkright v. Thomson, 1 E. D. Smith, 661; Cox v. Broderick, 4 E. D. Smith, 721.

It is not an action within the meaning of the Code, but a special proceeding. Hallahan v. Herbert, 57 N. Y. 409.

In an action to enforce a lien, the owner may avail himself of all matters allowable by way of recoupment or counterclaim arising out of the contract between the owner and the contractor, and which would be available against the contractor. The rights of the parties are determined by the facts existing at the time of the creation of the lien. Cheney v. Troy Hospital Assn. 65 N. Y. 282.

The proceedings must be conducted strictly in accordance with the provisions of the Lien Law. Mushitt v. Silverman, 50 N. Y. 360; Burroughs v. Tostevan, 75 N. Y. 567.

Amount recoverable.

The extent of the lien is distinctly made to depend upon the time when the notice was filed. The amount which the owner can be required to pay depends entirely (according to the construction of the Statute in Doughty v. Devlin, 1 E. D. Smith, 625), upon the time when the notice was filed. Kaylor v. O'Connor, 1 E. D. Smith, 672.

The clause in the Statute "must not exceed the amount which the owner would be otherwise liable to pay at the time of the filing of the claim," was intended solely to limit the liability of the owner in the aggregate to the amount which he had contracted to pay, after deducting such payments as he had made before the filing of the lien. The present Lien Law limits the liability to the stipulated price of the contract remaining unpaid at the filing of the lien. Heckmann v. Pinkney, 81 N. Y. 211.

The plaintiffs can recover no more than they claimed when they filed the paper to create the lien. The subsequent notice is to enforce the lien so created. By the notice filed, the amount originally stated, with interest, is the extent of the recovery. Protective Union of New York v. Nixon, 1 E. D. Smith, 671.

Costs.

The right to costs is created by statute, and wholly depends upon it, and the right does not become fixed until the determination of the suit. Onondaga Suprs. v. Briggs, 13 Denio, 173.

This rule was again asserted in Garling v. Ladd, 27 Hun, 112, and in Balcom v. Terwilliger, 42 Hun, 170.

tach only to advances due from her, if any, and not to her interest as vendor in the real estate. These defenses were overruled, and the lien was held to attach and bind the vendor's interest in the realty. Schmalz v. Mead differs from the case at bar only in the fact that the contract of sale and for building did not contain the stipulation contained in the agreement under consideration and quoted in the statement of facts,—that if any mechanics' lien was filed it should be subject to the lien and claim of the vendor. The defendant's relation to and interest in the land constituted her the owner thereof, within the meaning of the word "owner" as defined in the fifth section of the Mechanics' Lien Law (Schmalz v. Mead, supra), and her estate could be subjected to the liens of persons furnishing labor or materials for the construction of buildings erected thereon with her consent. By the contract entered into May 25, 1887, between Mrs. Mead, then the owner of the fee, and Gierke, and by him assigned to Grippentrog with her consent, she not only agreed to sell and thereafter convey the land, but bound the vendee to build within a specified time six houses according to plans which had been agreed on, to cost not less than $6,000 each, she agreeing to advance $21,000 for the purpose of partly paying the cost of their erection; which contract was proof of her (the owner's) consent that the buildings be erected, and rendered her interest in the premises subject to such liens as might be filed for labor and materials furnished for the construction of the houses, unless in some way relieved from liability by the stipulation that any mechanics' lien should be subject to her interest in the property. Schmalz v. Mead, supra; Rollin v. Cross, 45 N. Y. 766; Husted v. Mathes, 77 N. Y. 388; Burkitt v. Harper, 79 N. Y. 278; Otis v. Dodd, 90 N. Y. 336.

The stipulation in respect to the priority of liens did not destroy the owner's consent that the houses should be built, nor diminish its effect, nor did it lessen the absolute obligation resting upon the vendee to build them. It was not the design of the parties to accomplish any such results, but simply to circumvent the statute, and defeat the rights given by it to persons furnishing labor and materials for the work, which design could not be accomplished by such a stipulation as against persons not in privity with either of the parties to it who should, without notice of the stipulation, furnish labor or materials for the work.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs. All concur.

(August 21, 1891.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Los Angeles County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for alleged slander of title. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John Roberts and John D. Bicknell, for appellant:

If A states in public that B has no title to land which he (B) is about to sell, and thereby prevents the sale by him, A's statement that B has no title or that his title is defective, is a conclusion of law, and is slander of title. Addison, Torts (Dudley & Baylie's ed.) pp. 969, 970, and notes; Brook v. Rowl, 4 Exch. 521, 19 L. J. Exch. 114.

Slander of title ordinarily means a statement of something tending to cut down the extent of title, which is injurious only if it is false and malicious, not malicious in the worst sense, but with intent to injure the plaintiff, and that he has suffered damage thereby.

Pater v. Baker, 8 C. B. 868; Cooley, Torts, p. 221.

False, defamatory and malicious statements, made with the intent to injure the owner of land and his title thereto, constitute slander of title.

Dodge v. Colby, 11 Cent. Rep. 466, 108 N. Y. 445.

An action on the case is the proper remedy.

1 Bacon, Abr. 7th Eng. ed. pp. 108, 143; Penniman v. Rabanks, Cro. Eliz. 427.

Defendant having maliciously and without probable cause, and with intent to prevent the consummation of the sale, declared that he would not execute the deed provided for in the leases, even if tendered the purchase price as therein provided, Sketchley would have been justified in refusing to take a title from Burkett that was not marketable; and Burkett could not have prevailed in an action against Sketchley to enforce specific performance.

Messrs. Stephen M. White and George W. Knox, for respondent:

After the offer was made and accepted, the defendant, it is said, publicly asserted that plaintiff had no rights, or property, which he could thus convey to Sketchley; and thereupon Sketchley withdrew his proposal. But Mr. Sketchley could not have withdrawn his offer without plaintiff's consent, because that offer had been already accepted.

Where one under contract for the purchase of property is induced to refuse to complete the purchase by reason of slanderous words uttered concerning the property, by a third person, the vendor cannot sue such third person for slander. His remedy is on the contract of sale.

The publication must be made by the defendant. If the party to whom the slanderous words or statements of a written libel are sent, being the one defamed, gives it to the world, the defendant is not responsible.

Edwards v. Burris, 60 Cal. 157.

The exhibits cannot be relied upon to cure defects.

Los Angeles v. Signoret, 50 Cal. 298.

Harrison, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

defendant to recover the sum of $25,000 damages caused by certain false and malicious statements alleged to have been made by him concerning certain property of the plaintiff. The defendant demurred to the complaint upon the grounds of insufficiency and uncertainty, and from a judgment entered upon an order sustaining the demurrer the plaintiff has appealed.

Although the term "slander" is more appropriate to the defamation of the character of an individual, yet the term "slander of title" has by use become a recognized phrase of the law; and an action therefor is permitted against one who falsely and maliciously disparages the title of another to property, whether real or personal, and thereby causes him some special pecuniary loss or damage. In order to maintain the action, it is necessary to establish that the words spoken were false, and were maliciously spoken by the defendant, and also that the plaintiff has sustained some special pecuniary damage as the direct and natural result of their having been so spoken. As words spoken of property are not in themselves actionable, it is necessary to allege the facts which show wherein the plaintiff has sustained damage; and, as special damage is the only ground upon which the action can be maintained, it is essential that such damage be distinctly and particularly set out in the complaint. Linden v. Graham, 1 Duer, 670; Swan v. Tappan, 5 Cush. 104; Malachy v. Soper, 3 Bing. N. C. 871.

It is not actionable to speak disparagingly of the title of another unless he is damaged thereby. The utterance of a mere falsehood, however malicious, will not sustain an action unless damage has resulted therefrom (Add. Torts, 25); and the damage which can be recovered is only such as is the direct and natural result of the utterance of the words. As in all other cases dependent upon special damage, there must be both injury and damage. The slanderous words, false in fact and maliciously uttered, constitute the injury, and give the right of action; and the pecuniary damage sustained is the measure of recovery. If the words uttered are not false, or if there be no malice, there is no right of action, and there can be no recovery unless some special pecuniary damage has resulted from their utterance. In order to show that the words uttered have caused injury to the plaintiff, it is generally necessary to aver and show that they were uttered pending some treaty or public auction for the sale of the property, and that thereby some intending purchaser was prevented from bidding or competing. Folkard, Starkie, Slander & Libel, § 128; Odgers, Slander & Libel, 188.

"This action lieth not but by reason of the prejudice in the sale." Per Fenner, J., in Bold v. Bacon, Cro. Eliz. 346.

If the plaintiff has merely a general intention to sell, or if the words uttered do not reach any intending purchaser, or if they do not prevent any sale, or are uttered after the sale is completed or agreed upon and contracted for, the plaintiff does not suffer any damage from their utterance.

It is alleged in the complaint that in August, 1888, the plaintiff was the owner of a certain leasehold interest, with option and privilege of purchasing two certain tracts of land in Los Angeles County, and that one Arthur Sketchley was then negotiating and treating with him for the purchase of, and offered to purchase from him, an undivided one half of the same for the sum of $25,000, "and that the plaintiff accepted said offer;" that the defendant, well knowing the premises, did willfully, maliciously, and without probable cause, during the period that the said Sketchley was so negotiating and making the offer aforesaid, and prior and subsequent thereto, publicly state to divers persons (naming them), and to the plaintiff, "that the plaintiff had broken the covenants of his said leases, and had forfeited all rights thereunder and by virtue thereof," and that the defendant would not sell to the plaintiff, or to any person purchasing from him, the lands described in said leases, or execute a deed therefor on the tender of said purchase price; that the said statement and declarations were false, and were made by the defendant for the purpose of preventing the plaintiff from disposing of said leasehold interests and option, and that said Sketchley was informed of the said statements, and was intimidated, dissuaded, and deterred from carrying out his agreement with plaintiff, and withdrew his offer to purchase, and refused to purchase the same; that, but for said statements by defendant, Sketchley would have completed said purchase; and that by reason of the said statements plaintiff has been unable to sell said property to Sketchley, and has been thereby damaged in the sum of $25,000. The averment in the complaint that Sketchley offered to make the purchase from the plaintiff, and to pay therefor the sum of $25,000, and that "the plaintiff accepted said offer," must, for the purposes of the demurrer, under the familiar rule that the pleading is to be construed contra proferentem, be regarded as an allegation of a valid and efficient offer and acceptance, and that by virtue thereof a complete and executed contract of purchase and sale was entered into between them. This construction is corroborated by the subsequent averment that, after Sketchley was informed of the statements of the defendant, he was "intimidated, dissuaded, and deterred from carrying out his agreement with plaintiff," and shows that it was the intention of the pleader to allege such contract. This acceptance by the plaintiff of Sketchley's offer, and the agreement between them for the purchase and sale of the property, terminated the "treaty," and gave to the plaintiff a contract capable of being enforced against Sketchley, and on which he can recover any damages he may have sustained from its violation. The subsequent refusal by Sketchley to carry out his agreement did not give the plaintiff the right to recover in this action the damages thus sustained. In an action like the present, the plaintiff can recover only such damage as he may have sustained by reason of an intending purchaser being prevented from making the contract; but the complaint herein shows that whatever statements or declarations were made by the defendant prior to the making of the contract did not have the effect to prevent Sketchley from entering into the same, and those which he made thereafter have not caused the plaintiff any damage which can be said to have resulted therefrom. We know of no case in which it has been held that, when the plaintiff has a valid contract of sale, he can recover damages for its breach against one whose words, however false and malicious, have induced the other contracting party to violate such agreement.

In Morris v. Langdale, 2 Bos. & P. 284, in an action for defamation, the special damage alleged was that certain persons had refused to fulfill their contracts with the plaintiff in consequence of the words spoken; but Lord Eldon said: "Now, if the plaintiff has sustained any damage in consequence of the refusal of any persons to perform their lawful contracts with him, it is damage which may be compensated in actions brought by the plaintiff against those persons; and the law supposes that in such actions the plaintiff would receive a full indemnity." A similar principle is laid down in Townshend, Slander & Libel, § 206; Kendall v. Stone, 5 N. Y. 14; Vicars v. Wilcocks, 8 East, 1; Paul v. Halferty, 63 Pa. 46; Brentman v. Note, 24 N. Y. S. R. 281.

It is not shown by the complaint whether the plaintiff accepted the refusal of Sketchley to complete his purchase as a termination of the contract, or whether he still holds his right of action to enforce the contract. From the averment that "the said Sketchley was then and there, and at all times since has been, able and willing to purchase" the property contracted for, it would seem that Sketchley is still bound by the contract; and, if so, the complaint fails to show that the plaintiff has sustained any damage. In any action against Sketchley founded upon the contract, it would be no defense that he had been induced to refuse to complete his purchase by reason of the statements of the defendant alleged herein; and as, in such action, the plaintiff can recover all the damages he has sustained, he has no right of action herein against this defendant. If, on the other hand, the plaintiff has released Sketchley from the obligations of his contract, or does not desire to enforce the same, whatever damage he has suffered is the result of his own voluntary act, and cannot be visited upon this defendant. Kendall v. Stone, supra.

2. The complaint fails to show that the statements and declarations alleged to have been made by the defendant could have caused any damage to the plaintiff. It was necessary for the plaintiff to set forth and describe in his complaint the property respecting which the defamatory statements had been made, as well as to aver his title thereto, so that it might be shown wherein the defendant had done him any injury. The defamatory statements alleged to have been made by the defendant are "that this plaintiff had broken the covenants of his said leases, and that plaintiff had forfeited all rights thereunder and by virtue thereof." The only leases referred to in the complaint are those which are annexed to it as exhibits for the purpose of identifying the lands in which the plaintiff had a "leasehold interest, with option and privilege of purchasing." The plaintiff has not alleged the nature or extent of his leasehold interest, or the terms of his option, or what were the covenants of his leases, or the nature of his rights thereunder; nor has he alleged that the covenants or the option are those which are contained in the exhibits. As the statements alleged to have been made by the defendant referred to the "covenants of his said leases, and his rights thereunder," it was necessary to aver facts sufficient to show whether he had any rights, or whether there were any covenants to be violated or broken. The exhibits attached to the complaint are made a part thereof only for the purpose of identifying the lands referred to, and do not satisfy this requirement of pleading. Argumentative pleading is no more permissible under the Code than it was at common law. Matters of substance must be alleged in direct terms, and not by way of recital or reference, much less by exhibits merely attached to the pleading. Whatever is an essential element to a cause of action must be presented by a distinct averment, and cannot be left to an inference to be drawn from the construction of a document attached to the complaint. Los Angeles v. Signoret, 50 Cal. 298.

The only property to which the plaintiff alleges that he had any title is the leasehold interest and option to purchase. He does not allege that the defendant denied his title to this property, but charges him only with disparaging certain rights which the complaint does not allege that he possessed. The allegation that the defendant had stated that he would not sell the lands described in the leases cannot be regarded as any slander of his title, even if the complaint had shown any right to make a purchase from the defendant. The plaintiff, moreover, does not allege that Sketchley was informed of this declaration of the defendant.

3. The complaint also fails to show that the special damage alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff is the natural and direct result of the statements and declarations made by the defendant. This action is governed by the same rule that obtains in the ordinary action of slander, viz., that, if the words are not actionable in themselves, the originator of the slander is only liable for such damage as is the direct and natural result of his act, and that he is not liable for the subsequent repetition of those words by another without his direction or authority. Folkard, Slander & Libel, Starkie's ed. § 642; Addison, Torts, 795; Parkins v. Scott, 1 Hurlst. & C. 153; Ward v. Weeks, 7 Bing. 211; Tervoilliger v. Wanda, 17 N. Y. 54; Gough v. Goldsmith, 44 Wis. 262; Hastings v. Stetson, 126 Mass. 329.

This is but the application of the general rule that, when special damages are to be recovered, they must be the legal and natural consequence arising from the tort itself, and not from the wrongful act of a third party, remotely induced thereby. Crain v. Petrie, 6 Hill, 524.

The only special damage which the plaintiff has alleged is that Sketchley was informed of the statements and declarations made by the defendant, and withdrew his offer to purchase, and that the plaintiff thereby sustained damage. It is not alleged that the defendant ever made any statement or declaration to Sketchley, or in his presence, or that he directed or authorized any of his statements to be communicated to him; nor is it alleged that either of the persons to whom the defendant made such statements repeated them to Sketchley, or by whom or in what manner Sketchley "was informed" of the statements. The only connection between the statements by the defendant and their reaching Sketchley is that the defendant made them for the purpose of circulating the rumor and conveying the impression that the plaintiff had violated the covenants and conditions of his leases. This, however, is too remote to render the defendant liable.

We are of the opinion that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and that the demurrer was properly sustained, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

1. A conveyance by a father to his daughter in consideration of her marriage, made without intent on the part of either to defraud, is not fraudulent as to creditors, although the father is insolvent at the time.
2. Failure of a complaint to state a cause of action is cured by the filing of a cross-complaint in which the omitted facts are stated, even though a demurrer was interposed.

A PPEAL by defendant Knox from a judgment of the Superior Court for Alameda County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enjoin the sale of certain property

NOTE.—Ante-nuptial settlement.

The American rule is favorable to marriage articles when the party marrying on their faith had good reason to rely upon them as such. Schouler, Dom. Rel. § 177.

The consideration of marriage is a good and valuable consideration for such contracts. Bradish v. Gibbs, 8 Johns. Ch. 523, 1 L. ed. 704; Wright v. Wright, 54 N. Y. 440.

In England after-acquired property may be settled by the parties. Smith v. Osborne, 6 H. L. Cas. 375; Re Peddler, L. R. 10 Eq. 586; notes to Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 983, 984; Banning, Mar. Set. 80, 172, 179.

Ante-nuptial contracts, by which it is attempted to regulate and control the interest which each of the parties to the marriage shall take in the property of the other, like dower, are favored by the courts and will be enforced in equity according to the intention of the parties whenever the contingency provided by the contract arises. 2 Kent, Com. 166; Re Youngs, 27 Hun, 54, affirmed, 92 N. Y. 235.

No especial formality is requisite in such instruments, and, in order to effectuate the intentions of the parties, courts of equity will impose a trust upon the property agreed to be conveyed commensurate with the obligations of the contract, or will decree their specific performance, and when such relief is inadequate or impracticable from the situation of the property or the character of the contract, will award damages for its breach. De Barante v. Gott, 6 Barb. 496; Peck v. Vandemark, 99 N. Y. 23; Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1297, 1403; Schouler, Dom. Rel. 263-266, et seq.; Pierce v. Pierce, 71 N. Y. 154, 156.

The same principles apply to a conveyance in consideration of marriage, which is not only a val-levied upon by execution as belonging to Watson A. Bray. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William B. Sharpe and S. C. Devson for appellant.

Messrs. Scrivner & Boone and Garber, Boalt & Bishop for respondent.

McFarland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the year 1888 there was a treaty or agreement of marriage pending between the plaintiff, then a young unmarried woman, and Alfred H. Cohen. Cohen was then a young lawyer just beginning the practice of his profession, and having no income or means sufficient to procure a home and support a family, and they were both unwilling to get married until they had a home. These facts coming to the knowledge of Watson A. Bray, the father of plaintiff, he concluded, in order to encourage the consummation of said marriage, to convey to plaintiff a lot of land and build a house thereon as a home for the young couple, provided the father of said Cohen would furnish it. After some conferences between the said Bray and the father of said Cohen, the proposition was accepted by the latter; whereupon Bray, on July 12, 1888, conveyed a lot of land, being the premises described in the complaint herein, to the plaintiff (then Emma Bray) and proceeded immediately to build a house thereon, which was completed in the early part of 1884. This was done with the knowledge of Cohen, and he was consulted about it. The house was furnished by said Cohen's father. In February, 1884, plaintiff and Alfred H. Cohen were married, and moved into the house, where they have lived ever since. It is found by the court, and clearly established by the evidence, that the said conveyance of said lot to plaintiff, and the construction of said house thereon, were the consideration which induced said marriage, without which it would not then (if ever) have been consummated. The value of the lot and the cost of the house amounted at the time to about $16,000, and the present value of the property is $18,000. At the time of the conveyance of said lot to plaintiff and the building of said house, the said Bray was the owner of several hundred thousand dollars' worth of property, and supposed himself to be worth a quarter of a million of dollars. The conveyance was not made with any design on his part to hinder or defraud creditors (whether that fact be material or not), and it is entirely clear that plaintiff and her husband believed unable consideration, but the highest consideration known in law.

Thus, it is said by Story, J., in Magniac v. Thompson, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 393, 8 L. ed. 725. Nothing can be clearer, both upon principle and authority, than the doctrine that, to make an ante-nuptial settlement void as a fraud upon creditors, it is necessary that both parties should concur in or have cognizance of the intended fraud. If the seller alone intends a fraud, and the other party has no notice of it, he is not and cannot be affected by it. Marriage, in contemplation of the law, is not only a valuable consideration to support such a settlement, but is a consideration of the highest value; and from motives of the soundest policy is upheld with a steady resolution. The husband and wife, parties to such a contract, are therefore deemed in the highest sense purchasers for a valuable consideration, and, so that it is bona fide and without notice of fraud brought home to both sides, it becomes unimpeachable by creditors. To the same effect, see Campion v. Cotton, 17 Ves. Jr. 264, 272, and notes.

This is also the settled doctrine in Alabama. Andrews v. Jones, 10 Ala. 400, 421.

Consequently, if it is made in good faith, and without notice of fraud to the parties who take under it, it is unimpeachable by creditors. Eppes v. Randolph, 2 Call, 103; Bunnell v. Witherow, 29 Ind. 123; Frank's App., 53 Pa. 190; Magniac v. Thompson, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 348, 8 L. ed. 709; Campion v. Cotton, 17 Ves. Jr. 264; Ex parte McBurnie, 1 DeG. M. & G. 441; Coutts v. Greenhow, 2 Munf. 363, 4 Hen. & M. 485; Tunno v. Trezeant, 2 Desaus. Eq. 264; Jones' App., 62 Pa. 324; Bank v. Marchand, T. U. P. Charlt. 247; Partridge v. Copp, 1 Eden, 163 Ambl. 696; Cadogan v. Kennett, 2 Cowp. 432; Andrews v. Jones, 10 Ala. 400; Haselinton v. Gill, 3 T. R. 620, note; Croft v. Arthur, 3 Desaus. Eq. 223.

An ante-nuptial settlement, though made by the intended husband with the design of defrauding his creditors, will not be set aside in the absence of the clearest proof of the wife's participation in the fraud. Prewit v. Wilson, 103 U. S. 22, 26 L. ed. 360.

Tyler, on Infancy and Coverture, p. 464, says: "A court of equity will always support a marriage settlement, if no particular evidence of fraud is made out, showing an intention to deceive and defraud creditors."

Bishop states the doctrine on this subject as follows: "If a man, wishing to enter into matrimony with a particular woman, should, being insolvent, convey to her all his property, which was accepted by her with full knowledge of the fact, the nuptial intent being not to defraud his creditors, as a primary object, but to contract marriage, each on such terms as could be reasonably procured from each other, the case would not be within either of the Statutes of Elizabeth. Neither would it be in violation of any principles of the common law, because the common law, though it abhors every sort of cheating, loves matrimony; its principles all point towards it, whenever the circumstances of a case expose them to this attractive force." 1 Bishop, Married Women, § 784.

As against creditors, if both parties intend, or if the settlor intends, and the settlee has notice of such intent (Magniac v. Thompson, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 348, 8 L. ed. 700), to hinder, delay, or defraud his creditors, the contract, to the extent at least of the settlor's debts (Smith v. Cherrill, L. R. 4 Eq. 390), is void (Bulmer v. Hunter, L. R. 8 Eq. 46; Cadogan v. Kennett, 2 Cowp. 432; Andrews v. Jones, 10 Ala. 400; Phillips v. Meyers, 82 Ill. 67; Jones' App., 62 Pa. 324; Herring v. Wickam, 29 Gratt. 628; Colombine v. Penhall, 1 Sm. & G. 229); no matter what the consideration (Bulmer v. Hunter, 38 L. J. Ch. 543; Casen v. Murray, 15 Mo. 378; Ashmead v. Hean, 13 Pa. 534; Bozman v. Draughan, 3 Stew. 243; Moely v. Gainer, 10 Tex. 393, 419; and mere knowledge of the settlor's indebtedness (Campion v. Cotton, 17 Ves. Jr. 264; Richardson v. Horton, 7 Beav. 112), or insolvency (Sleson v. Roath, 30 Conn. 15), will not amount to fraudulent intent or notice, though they may go to prove it (Ex parte McBurnie, 1 DeGex. M. & G. 441; Marshall v. Morris, 16 Ga. 368; Croft v. Arthur, 3 Desaus. Eq. 223; Colombine v. Penhall, 1 Sm. & G. 228), just as the unreasonableness of the settlement may. Ex parte McBurnie, Marshall v. Morris, Croft v. Arthur, and Colombine v. Penhall, supra; Simpson v. Graves, Riley, Eq. 232; Bank v. Marchand, T. U. P. Charlt. 247; Stewart, Mar. & Div. § 39. See notes to McNutt v. McNutt (Ind.) 2 L. R. A. 372; Deshon v. Wood (Mass.) 1 L. R. A. 518.

him to be a man of large means, and fully able to make the said provision for her marriage, and that she accepted the same without any intent of hindering or defrauding his creditors. It turned out afterwards, however, that said Bray was, in fact, insolvent at the time said conveyance was made to plaintiff. On said July 12, 1883, the date of said conveyance to plaintiff, said Bray was indebted to the defendant Charles C. Knox in an amount exceeding $60,000; and on August 12, 1885, said Knox recovered judgment against said Bray for $79,218. On April 26, 1887, Knox caused an execution to be issued on said judgment, and delivered the same to the sheriff with instruction to levy it upon said lot conveyed by said Bray to plaintiff as aforesaid, as the property of said Bray. The sheriff made said levy, and was about to sell said lot, when the plaintiff brought this present action to restrain such sale, upon the ground that it would cast a cloud upon her title. The court gave judgment for plaintiff according to her prayer, and from said judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the defendant Knox appeals.

The main question presented is whether the said conveyance from Bray to his daughter, under the circumstances above stated, was void as against the creditors of Bray. This question has been very ably and elaborately discussed by counsel, and a multitude of authorities have been cited. We will not undertake here to review these authorities, but will merely state the conclusions to which they clearly lead. Where one party conveys land to another for a valuable and adequate consideration, the conveyance will be good against the creditors of the grantor, although the latter intended thereby to defraud his creditors, if the grantee had no knowledge of such intent, and was in no way a participant in the fraudulent purpose. Marriage is the highest and most valuable of considerations; and when a conveyance is made upon such consideration, the grantee, if guiltless of fraud herself, is in at least as firm and sure a position as if she had paid in money the full value of property conveyed. It has even been held that a voluntary conveyance to a daughter, intended as a settlement, and without present reference to her marriage, will become ex post facto valid against creditors and purchasers with only implied notice, if upon the credit of the conveyance a person has been induced to marry her. Marriage being in its nature permanent, and being the most important of all civil relations, the law will not lightly allow the inducements which have led to it to be disturbed. And the dowry of a bride, without special proof, is presumed to be an inducement to her marriage. The law does not require a delicate investigation into the quantum of influence which her property has had with her suitor. A few of the many authorities which establish the principles above stated are the following: Bump, Fraud. Conv. pp. 305, 306, and cases cited; Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 212, and cases cited; Magniac v. Thompson, 32 U. S. 7 Pet. 348, 8 L. ed. 709; Pruett v. Wilson, 103 U. S. 22, 26 L. ed. 360; Wood v. Jackson, 8 Wend. 9; Herring v. Wickham, 29 Gratt. 693; Iluston v. Cantril, 11 Leigh, 146, 155; Sterry v. Arden, 1 13 L. R. A.

Johns. Ch. 260, 271, 1 L. ed. 133, 137; Brown v. Carter, 5 Ves. Jr. 877, 878; Otis v. Spencer, 102 Ill. 623; Dugan v. Gittings, 3 Gill, 138, 43 Am. Dec. 306.

The case at bar presents a clear field for the application of these principles. It has none of those peculiarities or complications of facts which often make it difficult to determine what rule of law applies. It is a plain case of a conveyance upon the express consideration of marriage, which was the direct and immediate inducement of the marriage, and made, not only without any knowledge of fraud by the grantee, but without any intent to defraud on the part of the grantor. The court was therefore right in upholding the said conveyance against appellant, claiming as a creditor of Bray.

2. Appellant contends that the judgment should be reversed, because the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and because his demurrer on that ground was erroneously overruled. The point is, as we understand it, that facts constituting a cloud on plaintiff's title are not stated, because it does not appear that plaintiff derived her title from Bray, against whom the execution runs. The complaint shows, among other things (in brief), that since July 12, 1883, plaintiff has been the owner and in possession of a certain described lot of land; that said land is "a portion of W. A. Bray's Oak Tree farm tract, as surveyed for W. A. Bray by James T. Stratton, April, 1869, as per map," etc.,—"all of which was and is well known to the defendants herein;" that defendant Knox recovered judgment against Bray, caused an execution to be issued, and levied on said land as the property of Bray, and is about to have the same sold, as in this opinion heretofore stated, and that said sale will cast a cloud upon plaintiff's title, and greatly damage and impair the value thereof. It is not necessary to definitely determine whether this complaint is so totally defective in its statement of a cause of action as to be bad on general demurrer, or whether it merely presents a case of defective averments, assailable only on special demurrer; because defendant, in addition to his answer in which the averments of the complaint are denied, filed a cross-complaint in which he asked for affirmative relief, and in which he averred specifically the very facts which he contends should have been averred in the complaint of plaintiff. In his cross-complaint he avers that on said July 12, 1883, and for a long time prior thereto, the said Bray was the owner in fee and in possession of said land; that on said day he conveyed the same by deed to plaintiff, who is his daughter, that the deed was voluntary and without consideration; that plaintiff holds under said deed, and not otherwise; and that the deed was made to hinder and delay creditors, and particularly defendant. He prays that the deed be declared fraudulent and void, and that he be allowed to proceed with the execution. To this cross-complaint plaintiff filed an answer, in which she admitted said deed from Bray, and that she held under it, but denied that it was voluntary, or without consideration, or fraudulent, and averred the consideration of marriage, and the facts concerning said marriage, as heretofore stated. Upon these pleadings the case went to trial; and it would be a vain thing to reverse the judgment, and allow plaintiff to amend her complaint by averring facts already averred in the cross-complaint, and to again in that form present issues which have already been raised and determined. The appellant made no objection to the introduction by plaintiff of the said deed to her from Bray; and the issue of the validity of said deed, raised by the cross-complaint and answer to it, was the one issue tried; and therefore, if it be conceded that the complaint failed to state sufficient facts, such failure was cured by the statement of the omitted facts in the other pleadings, which present a case of "express aider." And the fact that there was a demurrer does not take it out of the rule. There was a demurrer in Schenck v.

Hartford F. Ins. Co., 71 Cal. 28, but the court held there that the omission of a material fact in the complaint was cured by its averment in the answer. That case, in principle, cannot be distinguished from the case at bar. See also Pom. Rem. § 579. Many cases to the same point are cited by counsel for respondent.

3. We see nothing in the point that an ante-nuptial contract must be in writing. No question arises here as to the enforcement of a verbal contract which ought to have been in writing. There are no other points necessary to be specially noticed. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Webber County in favor of complainants, in a suit brought to quiet title to certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Miller & Maginnis, for appellant:

To constitute a delivery good for any purpose, the grantor must divest himself of all power and dominion over the deed. To do this he must part with the possession of the deed and all right and authority to control it, either finally and forever, as where it is given over to the grantee himself or some person for him.

Pruteman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644.

If a grantor deliver any writing, as his deed to a third person to be delivered over by him to the grantee, on some future event, it is the grantor's deed presently and the third person is a trustee of it for the grantee.

To constitute a good donatio mortis causa, the first thing that is required is that the thing given must be personal property; second, that the gift must be made by the donor in peril of death and to take effect only in case the giver dies; third, there must be an actual delivery of the subject to convey a donatio in cases where delivery can be made.

The first requirement concludes the defendant in this case. It is impossible that there should be a gift mortis causa of real estate.

plaintiff Julia Eliza Peck is the widow and the other plaintiffs are the children and heirs-at-law of Henry Peck, late of Oneida County, Idaho Territory, deceased; that Henry Peck died at Malad, Oneida County, Idaho Territory, on or about the 28d day of July, 1889; that about ten days before his death he made a will by which he devised to the defendant certain real estate situated in Cache County, Utah Territory; that the devise in the will was for the purpose of having carried out the testator's temple work (meaning thereby certain pious, superstitious, and polygamous practices of the Mormon Church), to be carried on in the Mormon temple at Logan, Cache County, Utah; that the will was duly probated August 29, 1889, and the plaintiffs Howard Peck and Dwight Peck duly qualified as executors, and letters testamentary were duly issued to them on that day; that after the execution of the will, to wit, on the 17th day of July, 1889, the said Henry Peck executed a deed for the same real estate to the defendant, but that the deed was wholly without consideration, and was never delivered, and that after the death of the said Henry Peck the deed came wrongfully into the possession of the defendant, and she caused the same to be recorded in the records of Cache County, Utah. The plaintiffs claimed to be the owners of the land under the will and as heirs of Henry Peck, and asked to have their title quieted against the defendant. The defendant, by her answer, denied that the deed was never delivered, or that it came wrongfully into her possession, and alleged that the deed was duly executed by Peck in his lifetime, and "by him delivered to one Jenkin Jones, unconditionally, for the use and benefit of this defendant, with express directions and authority to deliver the same to this defendant upon the death of said Henry Peck, as a gift causa mortis; and that said deed was made and delivered in anticipation of the approaching death of said Henry Peck," and that Jones delivered the deed to her in pursuance of such authority. The depositions of Jenkin Jones, Henry R. Jones, and Howard Peck were introduced and read on behalf of plaintiffs. No evidence was offered by the defendant. At the close of the evidence the defendant asked leave of the court to amend her answer by striking out the words "causa mortis, and that said deed was made and delivered in anticipation of the approaching death of said Henry Peck," which was refused by the court, to which ruling the defendant excepted, and assigns the same as error.

The court found that Henry Peck was the owner of the land in controversy at the time of his death; that within ten days prior to his death he made an attempted devise of his property to the defendant, Cecilia Rees, by will, which devise was void under the statutes of Idaho Territory, where he resided prior to his death on the 22d day of July, 1889, and after his said will had been written; "and as an attempt to make a testamentary disposition of said property to the defendant, and without any consideration whatever, either good or valuable, made, executed, and delivered to one Jenkin Jones a deed for said property, said deed being in favor of the defendant, Cecilia Rees, she being named as grantee therein; that Jenkin Jones had no authority from the defendant to receive said deed, and was directed by said Henry Peck to keep said deed until after his death, and then deliver the same to the defendant; that about one week after the death of Henry Peck, Jenkin Jones sent said deed to the defendant through the United States postoffice; that until she received said deed through the mail the defendant had no knowledge of the existence of such deed, or of any deed." The court found that the plaintiffs are the only heirs-at-law of said Henry Peck, and are the residuary legatees under the will. As conclusions of law the court found that the deed never became operative and is void; that the plaintiffs are the owners of the property, and entitled to a decree quieting their title to the same. The defendant made a motion for a new trial, which was overruled, and the appeal is from the findings and judgment.

Counsel for defendant say in their brief that all claim of the defendant under the will is abandoned, and that they rest their case on the deed alone, and that the only question they present for determination is, Was there a delivery of the deed? They further say in their printed brief in this court that "it is admitted that the grantee, Cecilia Rees, had no knowledge of the execution of the deed until received by her through the postoffice, about one week after the death of Henry Peck. It is further admitted that neither the grantee, nor any person for her, paid any consideration for the deed." The evidence as to the delivery of the deed is as follows: Jenkin Jones, a witness for the plaintiff, testified: "I knew Henry Peck in his lifetime. I saw a deed for the Cache County land which appeared to be executed by him, and the deed was in my possession. Henry R. Evans delivered the deed to me at my residence in Malad City, just a little time before Henry Peck's death, and said, at the time of delivery, here was a deed for me to keep. No instructions at that time were given me. The deed was delivered to Cecilia Rees, after the death of Henry Peck for fully a week. I sent it, addressed to her, through the postoffice . . . A short time before the death of Henry Peck he called on me, and told me he was very sick, and did not know whether he would get well or not, and said he might make a paper or deed for Cecilia Rees, and asked me if I would deliver it, and told me to keep the matter to myself." Henry R. Evans testified: "Was acquainted with Henry Peck in his lifetime. I wrote a deed for him, conveying to Cecilia Rees the property in Cache County, and described in the complaint. . . . I had possession of the deed after it was made, and delivered it to Jenkin Jones. I received from Henry Peck instructions to deliver the deed to Jenkin Jones, with directions that he should send it to Mrs. Cecilia Rees, and I gave Jenkin Jones that direction. The deed was made and executed about a week before the death of Henry Peck. I delivered the deed to Jenkin Jones on the day it was made and executed. The deed was made in view of the approaching death of Henry Peck, and there was no express instruction whether it was or was not to be delivered in case he should live. He said Jenkin Jones would know what to do with it. I had already written his will for him." Howard Peck, a son of Henry Peck, and one of the plaintiffs in this action, testified that the deed was intended by his father as a gift in view of approaching death.

It will be observed that, even if the court had permitted the defendant to make the proposed amendment to the answer, striking out the admission that the deed was intended as a gift in view of the approaching death of Henry Peck, still that fact was abundantly proved by the evidence already introduced, and without objection; so that, even if the court erred in refusing to allow the amendment, it worked no prejudice to the defendant. The right to make the amendment is claimed under section 3256, 2 Comp. Laws 1888. We think there was no error in refusing the amendment. If the amendment had been made, the answer would have still contained the affirmative allegation that Peck executed and delivered the deed to Jenkin Jones for her benefit, and "with express directions and authority to deliver the same to this defendant upon the death of said Henry Peck."

While there can be but little doubt that the deed from Peck to the defendant was made to evade the Statute of Idaho Territory which rendered the devise in the will to defendant void in case Peck should die in less than thirty days after the execution of the will, still he had a right to deed her the property as a gift, and confer upon her a good title; and the only question for determination is, Did he so far execute his intentions as to render the deed operative? It is essential to the validity of every deed that it be delivered to and accepted by the grantee. It need not be delivered by the grantor himself, but may be delivered by anyone duly authorized by him to make such delivery. Nor need it be delivered to the grantee in person, but may be delivered to anyone authorized by the grantee to receive or accept it. If, however, a grantor execute a deed of gift of real estate, and place it in the hands of an agent to deliver to the grantee, and the grantor dies before delivery, no delivery can then be made, because the authority of the agent to act ended with the death of the principal; and in this case, unless the delivery to the agent Jones was a delivery to the defendant, there was no such delivery of the deed as would render it operative, and transfer the title to the defendant.

Peck being under no obligation, legal or moral, by reason of indebtedness, kinship, or otherwise, to convey the land to the defendant, no equity was created in her favor by reason of his intention to make the gift, superior to the equity of his heirs, and unless he succeeded in making the gift to her complete in his lifetime by delivery of the deed, no title could pass to her. But Jones was not the agent of the defendant to accept the deed for her, and hence a delivery to him was not a delivery to her. It does not appear in the evidence that Jones even knew her, but it does appear that he was not her agent for any purpose connected with the deed, for it is conceded she had no knowledge that such a deed, or any deed, would be made by Peck to her. Jones was the agent of Peck, and had no authority to do anything with the deed except as authorized by Peck, and Peck could have demanded and regained possession of it at any time during his lifetime. While, therefore, it was out of his immediate possession, it was under his control, and liable at all times to be recalled and canceled by Peck. The title, then, was in Peck at the time of his death, and not in defendant, for she had not so much as heard of the deed, much less accepted it, and did not hear of it for a week after Peck's death. Suppose she had died the next day after Peck's death, but before Jones forwarded her the deed, to whose heirs would the property have descended,—the heirs of Peck or the heirs of the defendant? If to her heirs, it could only be because the title was fully vested in her by the execution of the deed, although she had never accepted it by herself or agent, nor even heard of it, and we would have a case where a delivery of a deed was not essential to transfer title. If we concede that Jones could deliver the deed to the defendant a week after the death of Peck, and, when delivered to her, it would vest the title in her from that date, where was the title between the death of Peck and the delivery of the deed to the defendant? If the title was in abeyance during this time,—floating around, as it were,—what would have been the result if Jones had lost or destroyed or refused to deliver the deed? Suppose the instructions to Jones should be construed to mean that he was not to await the death of Peck before delivering the deed, and Peck had demanded the return to him of the deed, and that the defendant had heard of the deed and demanded of Jones that he deliver it to her, who would have had the greater right to it? We think there can be no question but that Jones, being the agent of Peck, would have been bound to redeliver the deed to him, for it is of the essence of a gift that it be voluntary, and may be recalled any time before actual completion. In Younge v. Guilbeau, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 636, 18 L. ed. 262, the grantor executed and caused to be recorded a deed to the grantee, without the knowledge of the grantee, and he did not know of its execution until after the death of the grantor, when the deed was found among his papers. In a suit between the heir of the grantor and those holding under the grantee the Supreme Court of the United States said: "The delivery of the deed is essential to the transfer of title. It is the final act without which all other formalities are ineffectual. To constitute such delivery the grantor must part with the possession of the deed, or the right to retain it. Its registry by him is entitled to great consideration upon this point, and might, perhaps, justify, in the absence of opposing evidence, a presumption of delivery."

In Parmalee v. Simpson, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 81, 18 L. ed. 542, one Bovey conveyed certain real estate to Simpson, to whom he was indebted, and placed the deed on record without the knowledge of Simpson. Two days later he mortgaged the same lands to Parmalee, and the mortgage was recorded before Simpson knew of the deed to him, and the court held that the mortgage took precedence over the deed. The court said: "The placing of the deed on record was Bovey's own act, and done without the assent of Simpson. Under this state of facts, there was manifestly no delivery. The execution and registration of a deed, and delivery of it for that purpose, does not vest the title in the grantee. If Simpson had agreed to accept the deed in liquidation of his debt, and constituted the register his agent to receive it, then the delivery of the deed to the register would have been, in legal contemplation, a delivery to him." See also Maynard v. Maynard, 10 Mass. 456; Samson v. Thornton, 3 Met. 281;

Jackson v. Phipps, 12 Johns. 419; Jackson v. Leek, 12 Wend. 105. So, in this case, the delivery of the deed to Jones did not vest the title in the defendant; and before she knew of its existence and had an opportunity to accept it, the title passed upon the death of Peck to the plaintiffs by operation of law.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

Max J. BAEHR

v.

A. A. CLARK, Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

A bona fide purchaser of diamonds from one who obtained them from their owner, under the fraudulent representation that he had a customer for them, and would return them or their price in an hour, with the intention of appropriating them to his own use, acquires no title as against the bailor.

(October 5, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Pottawattamie County, in favor of plaintiff in an action to recover possession of certain diamonds. Affirmed.

Statement by Rothrock, J.:

Action of replevin for a diamond ring and a diamond stud. The plaintiff and the defendant each claim to be the owner of said property. The cause was submitted to a jury, and the jury being unable to agree upon a verdict, by agreement of the parties the issue was afterwards submitted to the court without a jury, on the evidence taken by the short-hand reporter at the jury trial. The court, upon an examination of the evidence, found for the plaintiff. Defendant appeals.

Messrs. Flickinger Bros., for appellant:

Even if a criminal act had been committed by Barker this would in no way or manner determine the passing of the title to the property. Property does pass if the vendor so intends, however fraudulent the devices of the buyer may be to induce that intention.

Benjamin, Sales, § 437, and authorities cited.

In cases of fraud, criminal or otherwise, as between the parties, the property passes subject to the right of rescission on the ground of fraud, unless the rights of innocent third parties intervene.

Plaintiff, in stating the contract made with Barker, brings the case fairly within section 1922 of the Code, which provides: "No sale, contract or lease, wherein the transfer of title or ownership of personal property is made to depend on any condition, shall be valid against any creditor or purchaser of the vendee or lessee in actual possession, and obtained in pursuance thereof, without notice, unless same be in writing executed by the vendor or les-

NOTE.—When the vendee of personal property will not acquire title.

The principle is well recognized in the established rules regulating the sale of personal property, that no person can transfer title to another's property, unless the owner by some direct and unequivocal act has clothed him with the indicia of ownership. McGoldrick v. Willits, 52 N. Y. 612.

The reasoning in the case last cited is controlling upon McGoldrick v. Willits, supra. The defendant bought the plaintiff's whiskey from a third person who had neither real nor apparent authority from the owner to sell it. The ruling was that the vendee could acquire no better title, merely because it was disclosed by the evidence that he purchased in good faith. The rule caveat emptor applies, if any rule at all be necessary, to show that you cannot get a title to my property by a purchase, no matter how high your faith, from one who has no authority from me, real or apparent, to sell it.

One having possession of personal property as a bailee for hire, with an executory and conditional agreement for its purchase, which conditions have not been performed, can give no title thereto to a purchaser, although the latter acts in good faith and parts with value, and is without notice of the want of title of his vendor. Ballard v. Burgett, 40

N. Y. 314; Wait v. Green, 36 N. Y. 556; Austin v. Dye, 46 N. Y. 500.

A purchaser of chattels takes them, as a general rule, subject to whatever may turn out to be infirmities of the title. Farmers & M. Nat. Bank v. Logan, 74 N. Y. 538.

And it is a rule of extended application, that no person can transfer any greater title than he himself has in the thing transferred. 2 Kent, Com. 324; Salts v. Everett, 20 Wend. 267, 275; Brower v. Peabody, 13 N. Y. 121; Peer v. Humphrey, 2 Ad. & El. 495; Dows v. Perrin, 16 N. Y. 325; Covill v. Hill, 7 Denio, 323, 327; Whistler v. Forster, 14 C. The sale of chattels by one not in possession of the legal title conveys to the transferee no title in the goods, even where the purchase is for value and in entire good faith. This rule is supported by well-recognized authority. Boyce v. Brockway, 31 N. Y. 490; Brower v. Peabody, 13 N. Y. 121; Hoffman v. Carow, 22 Wend. 285; *Spaulding v. A sale is "the transfer of an absolute or general property in a thing for a price or money," and a conditional sale is such transfer subject to conditions, etc.

Messrs. A. W. Askwith and Wright & Baldwin, for appellee:

If Barker never had the title to the diamonds, any attempted transfer of title by him would confer none on his vendee.

Gimble v. Ackley, 12 Iowa, 27; Frans v. Young, 24 Iowa, 375.

Baehr did not sell the diamonds to Barker, but Barker obtained them under the false and fraudulent representation that he wanted to show them to a purchaser, and he had no intention of showing the diamonds to a purchaser at the time he got possession of them. The court could not reach any other conclusion. Such acts amount to a crime.

State v. Anderson, 47 Iowa, 142; State v. House, 55 Iowa, 466; State v. Joaquin, 48 Iowa, 131.

Baehr never intended to pass title to Barker.

Rothrock, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The court made special findings of the facts which it was thought were established by the evidence. We need not set out these findings in detail, but will recite such as are deemed material to a determination of the rights of the parties upon an appeal. The plaintiff is a dealer in diamonds at the City of Omaha, in the State of Nebraska. In the month of December, 1888, one J. J. Barker made his appearance at the plaintiff's place of business, and represented that he had a customer for a diamond ring and stud, and desired to examine the plaintiff's goods. He selected the ring and stud now in controversy, and the plaintiff delivered them to him to take them and show them to the party who desired to make the purchase. The sum of $450 was fixed as the price of the diamonds, and Barker was to return them, or return with the price, in an hour. The plaintiff saw no more of Barker for two or three days, when he succeeded in having an interview. Barker at first stated that he had been robbed of the diamonds; said he had been knocked down and robbed, and called attention to certain bruises on his face and marks on his fingers. The plaintiff threatened to have Barker arrested, and then he stated he had lost the diamonds at a gambling-house; and afterwards he stated that they were in possession of the defendant, Clark, at Council Bluffs. It was afterwards ascertained that Barker, after obtaining possession of the diamonds, crossed the Missouri river to Council Bluffs and stopping at a gambling-house kept by one Carrigg. While there he was in urgent need of money, and Carrigg advanced money to him, from time to time, and took and held the diamonds as security. When these advances amounted to $247 Carrigg, refused to make further advancements, and he and Barker went to the defendant with the diamonds, and sold them to him for the sum of $275 and Clark paid Carrigg, the keeper of the gambling-house, the sum of $247, and he paid Barker the balance, being $38. Barker represented to the defendant that the diamonds belonged to him. There are other facts disclosed in evidence as to efforts made by plaintiff to obtain payment for the property, and offers to purchase the diamonds from Clark, which are of no importance in the case. The plaintiff did not act which would in law estop him from asserting any claim he may have had at any time to recover the property from Clark. The court found that Clark was an innocent purchaser for value, and we incline to think that finding was correct. The only real question in the case is whether Clark is entitled to the property as an innocent purchaser? Other facts might be stated which authorize the conclusion that Barker obtained the possession of the goods by fraudulent representations, but enough has been stated to show that the court was fully authorized in finding that Barker had no customer for valuable diamonds. The fact that he did not return in an hour, but repaired to a gambling-house and pledged the diamonds to the keeper of the house, fully warrants the finding that he obtained possession of the property by fraud. If the plaintiff had sold and delivered the diamonds to Barker upon these representations, and Barker had resold to the defendant, he being an innocent purchaser, the plaintiff could not maintain this action. It is well settled that when goods are obtained from their owner by fraud, and the facts show a sale to the party guilty of the fraud, an innocent purchaser of the goods from the fraudulent vendee for value, and without notice of the fraud, will take the title. The true inquiry is, Did the owner intend to transfer both the property in and possession of the goods to the person guilty of the fraud. If he did, there is a contract of sale, however fraudulent the device, and the property passes, and subsequent innocent purchasers for value will be protected. Rouley v. Bigelow, 12 Pick. 312; Perkins v. Anderson, 65 Iowa, 398; 1 Parsons, Cont. 520. And see Onwego Starch Factory v. Lendrum, 57 Iowa, 573, in which the rule announced is recognized, but held not applicable to an attaching creditor of the fraudulent vendee. Robinson v. Pogue, 86 Ala. 257; Hutchinson v. Watkins, 17 Iowa, 475; Chicago Dock Co. v. Foster, 48 Ill. 507.

But this rule has no application unless there is an actual sale of the property by the alleged vendor. If one delivers property to another as a mere bailee, a purchaser from the bailee acquires no title, however innocent he may be. He has no more right to assert title to the property than if it had been stolen, and his purchase had been from the thief. The principle upon which this distinction rests is that the vendor in the cases last supposed does not part with the title to the property, nor does he have any such intention, and the fraudulent possessor of the property can convey no title to any third person, however innocent; for no property has passed to himself from the true owner. Benjamin, Sales, 369; Rohrbough v. Leopold, 68 Tex. 254; Church v. Melville, 17 Or. 418.

It is very plain that the transaction between the plaintiff and Barker did not pass the title of the diamonds to Barker. He did not pretend or claim that he wanted to purchase diamonds. He was intrusted with the possession of them merely as the agent of the plaintiff, and instead of returning them, he embezzled them by pawning them in a gambling-house, and by subsequently, in connection with the keeper of the house, selling them to the defendant. The authorities appear to be uniform that in such case the purchaser from a mere agent or bailee acquires no title, even though he pay value, and has no notice of the embezzlement, and that the rule caveat emptor applies. It is idle to contend that Barker did not have the criminal intent to embezzle the diamonds when he obtained possession of them from the plaintiff. There is no evidence that he had any friend who was in need of diamonds. All of his acts subsequent to the time he acquired possession indicate that his purpose, from the inception of his enterprise, was not to procure a purchaser for the property, but to appropriate it to his own use. There are no other questions in the case which demand consideration.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

APPPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the District Court for Fayette County in favor of defendants in a proceeding by garnishment to enforce payment of a judgment in favor of plaintiffs out of the proceeds of a policy of fire insurance, upon certain books and instruments belonging to defendant Hanes, which had been destroyed by fire. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—Exemption Laws should receive a liberal construction.

The Statute exempting certain property of the debtor from execution should be fairly construed to enable the debtor to enjoy such property. If when such property is wrongfully taken from the debtor against his will, the law does not afford him an adequate remedy for the injury and protect him in its enforcement, the Statute is to the extent of the failure rendered nugatory. Such construction should be adopted as will secure the debtor in the enjoyment of the exempt property, and afford him an adequate and complete remedy for a violation of his right. Andrews v. Rowan, 28 How. Pr. 128.

Even an agreement "to waive all exemptions to property" creates no estoppel, and in the eye of the law such a contract is hard, oppressive and unconscionable, and totally void as in contravention of the spirit of our statutes, and of public policy. Harper v. Leal, 10 How. Pr. 276.

Beck, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The plaintiffs caused process of garnishment to be issued against the Capitol Insurance Company upon a judgment against defendant, claiming that the insurance company is a debtor of defendant upon a policy issued to him upon which there had been a loss of the property insured. A motion to dismiss the proceeding was sustained, upon the grounds, which were not disputed, that the property insured was exempt from execution, being books, instruments, etc., used by defendant, who was a physician and surgeon, in the practice of his profession.

2. The question presented for decision by the record is this: Are the avails of insurance upon personal property which is exempt under the Statute from debts of the assured also exempt? The Statute (Code, § 8072) declares that "If the debtor is a resident of this State, and is the head of a family, he may hold exempt from execution "certain personal property, which includes the books, instruments, etc., of a physician, the property covered by the policy of insurance in this case. There is no provision as to the exemption or liability of the proceeds or avails of such property when disposed of by sale or otherwise.

3. The purpose of the Statute is to secure to the debtor, who is the head of the family,—a physician and surgeon in this case,—the instruments, books and other articles which enable him to practice his profession. Its purpose is to secure the necessities of life—food, raiment and shelter—to families who are dependent upon heads thereof, by securing to them the instruments and means by the use of which they are enabled to support their families. The exemption is plainly for the benefit of families of debtors, for those having no family can claim no exemption. The Statute must be liberally construed, to carry out its purpose and spirit. Bevan v. Hayden, 13 Iowa, 123; Davis v. Humphrey, 22 Iowa, 189; Kaiser v. Seaton, 62 Iowa, 463.

The debtor in the case before us was authorized, under the Statute, to hold the property in question exempt from debts, if it were used for the purpose of his profession. It is plain that the use for which the property was kept determined the question of its exemption. The books, instruments, etc., of the physician and surgeon may be kept subject to the authority to change them, by sale or otherwise, in order to procure those of better character or improved construction. It is plain that the physician may sell his books, and replace them by better ones. Such sale is a proper use of his books and instruments in his profession. Another proper use of his books and instruments is their preservation from injury and destruction. He may insure them, to protect himself and family from loss from fire. The fact that they were insured would not make them subject to his debts. If they are destroyed by fire, the indemnity secured by insurance stands in the place of the books. It is intended to preserve the physician's library by securing means for its restoration after it is lost by fire. Surely that indemnity which is the indebtedness of the insurance company, or the money paid by it, stands in the place of the library, and ought to be, as it is, exempt from execution. The money due on the policy stands in the place of Exemption Laws seek to promote the general welfare of society by taking from the head of a family the power to deprive it of certain property by contracting debts which will enable creditors to take such property in execution. Parties ought not, therefore, to be permitted to contravene the policy of the law by contract. Kneettle v. Newcomb, 22 N. Y. 249; Crawford v. Lockwood, 9 How. Pr. 547; Harper v. Leal, 10 How. Pr. 278. Contra, McKinney v. Reader, 6 Watts, 34; Case v. Dunmore, 23 Pa. 98; Lauck's App. 24 Pa. 426; Bowman v. Smiley, 31 Pa. 225; Anderson, Law Dict. title, Exemption.

In most of the States, and probably in the larger number of cases in all the States where this exemption is claimed, it must be done by the debtor for whose benefit the provision of the Statute applies. In Illinois at least, however, where the subject of garnishment is wages due an employé, and such:

wages are exempt, it is the duty of the employer when garnished to make the claim for him. Thus, if a railroad company pay over to the plaintiff, when it is garnished, wages exempt by law, when the employé to whom such wages are due is the head of a family, it will still be liable to the employé. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Ragland, 84 Ill. 375.

So in Vermont, where the garnishee knows that money in his hands was received for a pension due the defendant from the government, and is for that reason exempt, he cannot be charged, and should at least bring this fact to the knowledge of the court, if not make a complete defense against the proceeding by which he is sought to be held as garnishee. Hayward v. Clark, 50 Vt. 612; Adams v. Newall, 8 Vt. 190; Lock v. Johnson, 38 Me. 464; Pierce v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 36 Wis. 233; Webb v. Holt, 57 Iowa, 712; 2 Wade, Attachm. § 401.

the property destroyed, and this must be true whether the money takes the place of the property by contract, or is acquired in invitum by proceedings against the owner.

It is plain that a trespasser, by appropriating the property and converting it to his own use, cannot make it subject to the payment of the owner's debts by holding the value of the property the measure of the debtor's damages for the trespass, subject to garnishment by the creditors. If he could do this, it would be a convenient method to defeat the exemptions of the Statute. As we before remarked, the object of the Statute is to secure to the family the benefit of certain property. These benefits cannot be enjoyed unless the debtor have the unrestricted use and control of the property, free from liability for debts as long as it is owned and used by him. When it is used for other purposes than the support of the family it becomes liable for debts. But the change of the property into money will not indicate an immediate abandonment of the claim of exemption to the money on the ground of a purpose to invest it in like or other exempt property. Until an opportunity exists to make such investment, which is not a change of articles of exempt property, the debtor ought not to be presumed to abandon his claim. The debtor, as we have seen, has the authority to change the articles of exempt property by sale and purchase, exchange, or otherwise. He cannot be presumed to have abandoned his right to this authority until he has had an opportunity to exercise it. The creditor cannot complain of its exercise. He is defeated of no right thereby. The property is held free of his debt, and he is not prejudiced by the change to the other like property.

These doctrines and conclusions find support in the following decisions of this court: Kaiser v. Seaton, 62 Iowa, 468; Mudge v. Lanning, 68 Iowa, 641. See also cases cited in Kaiser v. Seaton, supra, and the following: Evans v. St. Paul Harvester Works, 63 Iowa, 204; Brainard v. Simmons, 67 Iowa, 646; Leavitt v. Metcalf, 2 Vt. 342; Mulliken v. Winter, 2 Duval, 256; Tillotson v. Walcott, 48 N. Y. 188.

Counsel for plaintiffs cite Wooster v. Page, 54 N. H. 125. It is not in harmony with our conclusions. We think that the reasoning upon which it is based is not sound. Other cases cited by the same counsel are not in conflict with our conclusions. They are to the effect that sales of exempt property, with no purpose to reinvest the avails in other like property, or to exchange the articles of exempted property, or are cases involving the exemption of pension money, and some other cases involving like questions, none of which are in conflict with our conclusions in this case.

We reach the conclusion that the judgment of the District Court ought to be affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

JAMESVILLE & WASHINGTON R. CO.,

Appt.,

v.

A. FISHER.

(....N. C....)

An infant may be appointed a deputy sheriff unless otherwise provided by statute, although under the State Constitution he cannot be an "officer."

(October 13, 1891.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Beaufort County dismissing the action for want of legal service of process. Reversed.

Statement by Avery, J.:

This was a civil action originally instituted before a justice of the peace, and brought by appeal to the Superior Court of Beaufort County, in which court it was tried at the May

Term, 1890, before Whitaker, J. The return of the officer upon the summons was as follows: "Received March 24, 1890. Served March 24, 1890, by reading the within summons to A. Fisher. R. T. Hodges, Sheriff. By J. H. Hodges, D. S."

Both in the court of the justice of the peace and in the superior court the defendant entered a special appearance, and moved to dismiss for want of service, because James H. Hodges, who actually served the summons as deputy for R. T. Hodges, was at the time of serving it under the age of twenty-one years. It was admitted in both courts that he (James H.) was not twenty-one years old on said 24th March, 1890, when said summons was served by him. From the judgment of the court dismissing the action the plaintiff appealed.

Mr. John H. Small for appellant.

Mr. Charles F. Warren, for appellee:

By Const. art. 6, §§ 1, 4, the age at which

NOTE.—Infants as deputy sheriffs.

At common law the office of sheriff might be granted to one in fee, and the grant was not void although the office might descend to an infant. Reynel's Case, 9 Coke, 97b.

The reason assigned by Abbott, Ch. J., for the validity of such grants was that responsible deputies might be appointed on behalf of infants in case the office descended to them. Claridge v. Favyn, 5 Barn. & Ald. 81.

An infant could not be appointed general deputy sheriff, but might be deputed to serve a particular writ. McCracken v. Todd, 1 Kan. 169.

Under the Vermont statutes a special deputation for the service of a particular writ is valid. Barrett v. Seward, 22 Vt. 178.

It has also been held valid in New Hampshire. Moore v. Graves, 3 N. H. 411.

Women as deputy clerks.

In strict analogy to the doctrine of the principal case are the following authorities holding that a woman, though incompetent to hold the office of clerk of court, may lawfully be appointed deputy clerk. *Warwick v. persons may become officers is fixed at twenty-one years.

By section 2067 of the Code it is provided that no person shall be eligible to the office of sheriff who is not of the age of twenty-one years, etc.

If the position of deputy sheriff is an office under the laws of North Carolina, then it would seem to be reasonably clear under the Constitution of North Carolina and the Statute above referred to that a minor is ineligible.

In Cuckson v. Winter, 2 Mann. & R. 313, service by an infant acting as deputy was held as illegal.

Avery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A sheriff is liable to answer in damages for any wrongful act of his deputy done under color of his office, for which the sheriff would have incurred such liability had he done the act himself, and in all such cases he and his deputy are, in contemplation of law, one person. Murfree, Sheriffs, §§ 20, 59, 60, 62. So far has this doctrine, as to all wrongful acts of the deputy done colore officii, been carried by this court, that a demand on a defaulting deputy for money collected by him in that capacity has been declared equivalent to a demand on the sheriff. Lyle v. Wilson, 26 N. C. 226.

While a deputy is professing to act, and inducing others to believe that he is acting, under color of his office, his personality, like that of other agents, seems to be merged, in legal contemplation, in the person of the sheriff under whose directions, as principal, he is supposed to act. Murfree, Sheriffs, §§ 20, 61. The service of the summons is a mere ministerial duty which can be performed by a deputy, where the law gives the right to appoint one, and even as between him and third persons his official acts are considered those of the sheriff, done by his lawfully constituted agent. The right to appoint under-sheriffs or bailiffs and deputies is not always, if generally, regulated by statute. These subordinates are the servants and agents of the sheriff, and his responsibility for them and relations with them are controlled generally by the law governing the relation of principal and agent. Id. §§ 16, 60. While policy may have induced the courts to hold his responsibility in some instances to be greater, never less, than that of a principal for the acts of his agent within the scope of the agency, our Code is still silent as to the manner of appointment or the distinct duties of both general and special deputies, while this court has declared that there is no provision of the common law which requires the deputation of a sheriff to be in writing, and that, in any action against a sheriff for the misconduct of a person alleged to be his deputy, it is not necessary to prove a deputation, but it is sufficient simply to show that the person acted as deputy with the consent or privity of the sheriff. State v. Allen, 27 N. C. 36; State v. McIntosh, 24 N. C. 58.

In some of the States statutes have been enacted providing for the appointment of general deputies and bailiffs, and prescribing certain duties and liabilities arising out of the position; and the interpretations of these laws have given rise to some confusion, and apparent conflict, in the decisions of different States. In some of these States we find distinctions drawn by the courts as to the duties, powers, and liabilities of general deputies, coming within the provisions of their statutes, and special deputies, who are left as at common law to be treated as the trusted servants or agents of the sheriff. Proctor v. Walker, 12 Ind. 660.

In North Carolina, both general and special deputies may be appointed by the sheriff without writing, and, when they act with his assent or privity, they are either his general or special agents as to the discharge of his ministerial duties, and are accountable to him as such. An individual can unquestionably constitute an infant his agent, and subject himself to responsibility for all acts of the latter within the scope of the agency. Wharton, Ag. §§ 15, 16; 1 Lawson, Rights, Remedies & Practice, § 6; Story, Ag. § 7.

In the absence of statutory restrictions, we see no reason why a minor, appointed by the sheriff as his general or special deputy, should not have the power to perform a mere ministerial duty of his office, such as serving a summons issued in a civil action. Murfree, Sheriffs, § 71; McGee v. Eastis, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 307; Barrett v. Seward, 22 Vt. 176; Milker v. McMillan, 4 Ala. 530; Ewell, Evans, Ag. *40, 41. Indeed, Judge Story says (in a note to section 149 of his work on Agency): "There is a distinction between doing an act by an agent and doing an act by a deputy, whom the law deems such. An agent can only bind his principal when he does the act in the name of his principal. But a deputy may do the act and sign his own name, and it binds the principal; for the deputy, in law, has the whole power of the principal." This citation is made not to give approval to the distinction drawn by him, but to show that the learned jurist considered a deputy as sustaining the relation of an agent to the officer who appoints him. If a deputy-sheriff were, by law, constituted an officer, and the mode of appointing him and inducing him into office were prescribed, as in some of the States, our view of this case might be materially different. Guyman v. Burlingame, 36 Ill. 203; Murfree, Sheriffs, § 72.

The qualifications of an officer are clearly set forth in sections 4 and 5 of article 6 of the Constitution, and it is declared essential that he should be "twenty-one years old;" but we find no provision in our Constitution or laws which restricts the right to appoint agents on the one hand, or the liability for their acts on the other. In Yeargin v. Siler, 83 N. C. 348, Justice Dillard, for the court, says: "The rule in matters judicial is delegatus non potest delegare; but in duties ministerial the officer may act in person or by deputy, of his own choice and appointment." We think that, in the absence of any statutory restriction, the sheriff has the power to appoint a minor his general, as well as his special, deputy, and clothe him with the power of a bailiff, as to his ministerial duties, as effectually as he could constitute him his agent to attend to private business for him as an individual. Broom, Legal Maxims, 619. The current of authority in this country sustains this view. It is true that in the English case cited by counsel (Cuckson v. Winter, 3 Mann. & R. 313) the court held that it was highly improper for a sheriff to intrust the service of a warrant in replevin to an infant, because the deputy was authorized to take possession of the goods, and was responsible for the custody of them, and that service of the warrant by the infant was illegal. The learned judge who tried the case below was doubtless influenced by this authority in holding the service void in our case. But the conclusion of the court in Cuckson v. Winter seems to be based upon the idea that a defendant, whose goods were taken for rent, had no remedy for an unlawful seizure except against the deputy. That difficulty is met by holding that the sheriff is civilly responsible for the unlawful acts of his deputy to the extent to which he would be liable if he had acted in his own proper person; and that he selects and appoints his agents at his own hazard, third parties having no interest in the security he may exact from them. Murfrees, Sheriffs, §§ 20, 59, 60, 64. Thus in every way the courts of this country have, in the absence of specific statutory provisions, adjusted the powers of sheriffs and their deputies, and their liabilities to the public and to each other, according to the rules which determine the duties and responsibility of principal and agent, and have recognized the right of the sheriff to select such agents for the discharge of mere ministerial duties, as an individual could appoint and constitute for the transaction of private business, even though he might intrust the duty to a person not sui juris. Id. §§ 71, 75, and references; Yeargin v. Siler, supra. Mr. Wharton says, in substance, that the only qualification of the rule that infants may act as agents, and bind their principals, is that the infant agent must not be very deficient in mental capacity. Wharton, Ag. § 15.

We think that the judge below erred in sustaining the demurrer, and the judgment is therefore reversed. The cause will be remanded, to the end that the defendant may be allowed to answer if he be so advised.

Judgment reversed.

SOUTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

John J. McCLURE, Admr., etc., of George W. Melton, Deceased,
v.

Margaret A. MELTON et al., Respts.,
W. Holmes HARDIN, Intervenor, Appt.

1. The doctrine of subrogation cannot be invoked for the enforcement of a judgment against the estate of one who agreed to pay it as part of the consideration for property which he bought, subject to its lien, in favor of one who afterwards bought the property from him with notice of the judgment, and who was compelled to pay it for his own protection, where there was no privity between him and the one with whom the agreement was made, and the judgment was against the latter and primarily payable out of the property purchased.

2. A mortgage on property given to secure payment of its purchase price cannot be kept alive against the mortgagor's estate in favor of one to whom the property was afterwards transferred, and who for his own protection had to make a payment contemplated by the mortgage, where it was never a lien on any other property of the mortgagor.

3. Sealed notes which have been surrendered up and canceled by a valid arrangement between the parties thereto, cannot afterwards form a legal cause of action in favor of a stranger against their maker's estate.

4. No damages can be recovered for

NOTE.—Voluntary covenants, how far enforceable.

The tendency of the early cases was specifically to enforce a voluntary covenant, especially where it was founded on a meritorious consideration; thus: Elms v. Nimmo, Lloyd & G. 333, held that an agreement by a father to make provision for his married daughter upon consideration of natural affection would be specifically enforced in equity against the father as being founded on a meritorious consideration. This case was questioned in Holloway v. Headington, 8 Sim. 324, and overruled in Jefferys v. Jefferys, 1 Craig & P. 138, where a covenant by a father to surrender certain copyhold estates for the benefit of his daughters was refused execution against the father's widow, who had gone into possession of them after his death. See also Dillon v. Coppin, 4 Myl. & C. 647; Moore v. Crofton, 3 Jo. & Lat. 442.

A covenant in a deed by a man to his grandchildren, granting slaves on consideration of love and affection, that the grantor will defend the title to the slaves, will sustain an action in favor of the grantees. Stovall v. Barnett, 4 Litt. 208.

Covenants founded upon a good or meritorious consideration are enforced specifically in equity. Hayes v. Kershaw, 1 Sandf. Ch. 258, 7 L. ed. 321.

wards v. Jones, 1 Myl. & C. 228; Meek v. Kettlewell, 1 Hare, 464, 1 Phill. 342; Buford v. McKee, 1 Dana, 107.

These cases rest largely upon authority like the following: A voluntary agreement by a father with a child to convey land will be specifically executed. Mahan v. Mahan, 7 B. Mon. 579; Bright v. Bright, 8 B. Mon. 194; McIntire v. Hughes, 4 Ky. 186, citing Husband v. Pollard, cited in Randal v. Randal, 2 P. Wms. 467; Cotton v. King, 2 P. Wms. 357; Goring v. Nash, 3 Atk. 185; Hardham v. Roberts, 1 Vern. 132; Bradley v. Bradley, 2 Vern. 163; Tudor v. Anson, 2 Ves. Jr. 582; Sarth v. Blanford, Gilb. 166.

A sealed contract by a father to convey to his daughter land of which he put her in possession will, on her application, be specifically enforced in equity. Haines v. Haines, 6 Md. 438.

But it has been said that voluntary conveyances are not enforced in equity. Anthony v. Harrison, 14 Hun, 206, citing Ellison v. Ellison, 6 Ves. Jr. 661; Jefferys v. Jefferys, 1 Craig & P. 137; Buford v. McKee, 1 Dana, 107; Hayes v. Kershaw, 1 Sandf. Ch. 258, 7 L. ed. 321; Duvoll v. Wilson, 9 Barb. 487.

And where a man in consideration of love and affection executed a deed to his grandchildren, which contained a covenant of seisin, the grantees were not permitted to maintain an action against the grantor's executors to compel them to pay off breach of a covenant of warranty in a deed given in consideration of love and affection, under a statute limiting the recovery in case of breach of covenants of warranty, to the amount of purchase money paid, with interest thereon.

5. The grantee in a quitclaim deed, without warranty, who takes the property with notice that it is subject to a judgment lien, cannot, upon paying the judgment for his own protection, maintain an action against his grantor to recover the amount paid; and it is immaterial that the latter may have assumed payment of the lien by contract with a third person.
6. An injunction preventing the bringing of suits against a decedent's estate, which does not prevent creditors from coming in and proving their claims in the case in which the injunction was granted, will not prevent a claim from becoming barred by the Statute of Limitations if it is not presented within the statutory period.
7. An action cannot be maintained upon a simple contract to relieve property from the lien of a judgment, after the expiration of six years, although one entitled to benefit by the obligation is not damaged by its breach, in having to pay the judgment himself until after the expiration of that time.

APPEAL by the intervening petitioner from a judgment of the Common Pleas Circuit Court for Chester County dismissing his petition, setting up a claim against the estate of George W. Melton, deceased, in an action by Melton's administrator to marshal the assets of his estate. Affirmed.

The decree rendered by the court below is as follows:

"The cause entitled J. J. McLure, administrator of George W. Melton, was instituted by the administrator against M. A. Melton and others to facilitate the settlement of the estate a mortgage on the property out of the assets of their testator. Duvoll v. Wilson, 9 Barb. 487.

In Marling v. Marling, 9 W. Va. 79, the court extensively reviews the authorities, and holds that Ellis v. Nimmo, Lloyd & G. 333, is approved by the weight of American authorities, and decides that a court of equity will effectuate a gift of lands by a father to his child.

Marshaling grantor's estate in favor of grantee.

In case of a voluntary settlement of real estate in favor of children, with covenants that it should remain to the proper use and for quiet enjoyment, where the grantor afterwards mortgaged the settled estate and died, the children were held entitled to throw the mortgages on the unsettled estate and as against the legatees to prove under the covenant against the settlor's assets for the damages sustained by breach of the covenant. Hales v. Cox, 32 Beav. 118.

Where a father made a voluntary settlement under seal on his sons with covenant to warrant and defend, and subsequently compromised an ejectment suit for the property by receiving a money consideration, the sons were permitted to maintain a bill to compel payment out of his assets after his death of the amount which he received from the compromise. *Williamson v. of G. W. Melton, which was insolvent. Creditors of the estate were enjoined from proceeding against it save through that action, and were required to establish their demands in it. W. Holmes Hardin claims to be a creditor of the estate, and seeks by this petition to be allowed to establish his demand. The facts upon which petitioner supports his demands are as follows: On the 25th of November, 1887, C. D. Melton sold and conveyed to G. W. Melton a dwelling-house and land adjacent for a large sum of money. Notes were executed by G. W. Melton to C. D. Melton for the purchase price, and these notes secured by a mortgage of the premises. When the note which had the longest time to run matured C. D. and G. W. Melton had a settlement on 25th November, 1871. It was agreed that G. W. Melton should assume the payment of several judgments, which had been obtained against C. D. Melton prior to the conveyance of the house and land to G. W. Melton and which were liens upon the property, and which in the aggregate were about equal in amount to the aggregate sum due upon G. W. Melton's notes. Upon this understanding the notes and mortgage of G. W. Melton were canceled and given up to him. G. W. Melton, in pursuance of this agreement, paid all the judgments which were liens upon the land save one, known as the 'Wright judgment.' That judgment, at the time the others were paid, was in litigation, its validity as a lien being in controversy. Its validity as a lien was finally established. It was obtained 15th November, 1867. In the mean time the house and land had been conveyed by G. W. Melton to trustees, with warranty, in trust for his wife and children. G. W. Melton died insolvent, and had not paid the Wright judgment. The trustees who had the title to the property asked and obtained leave of the court to sell it with a view of making a more advantageous investment for the cestui que trustent. At the sale thus ordered the petitioner here, nants of said in fee of the premises, charged the grantor's estate with an annuity upon breach of covenant a fund was set apart from the personal estate of the grantor to answer the annuity. Giles v. Roe, 2 Dickens, 570, citing Whaley v. Norton, 1 Vern. 483; Matthew v. Hanbury, 2 Vern. 187; Anandale v. Harris, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 31; Priest v. Parrot, 2 Ves. Jr. 160.

Damages for breach.

In contrast with the main case is the decision that, on the consideration of natural affection, damages may be recovered for a breach of the covenant of warranty in a deed, as a gift by way of advancement to the grantor's granddaughter; and that where a money consideration is expressed in the deed the damages will be limited to that amount with interest thereon. Hanson v. Buckner, 4 Dana, 261.

In case of a deed of settlement, after grantor's death, on his nephews and nieces in consideration of love and affection, with covenants for further assurance and a subsequent will of the same property to others after his death, a bill against the executors to compel performance of the covenant was dismissed (*Ward v. H. P. F.

W. Holmes Hardin, became the purchaser for the sum of $5,000. In a little more than a year after his purchase he sold to another for the sum of $6,000. All this while the Wright judgment was in litigation, and, as before said, its validity and as a lien upon this house and land was finally established. All the time of these transfers this judgment had been of record in the register's office of Chester County, and upon the final determination of the contest as to it W. Holmes Hardin's vendee, James C. Hardin (who had it under a warranty deed from W. Holmes Hardin) was in possession. After further litigation, which need not be set out here, the Wright judgment was levied upon the house and land. W. Holmes Hardin paid to the sheriff of Chester County the amount, principal, interest, and costs, of the Wright judgment, and thus made good his warranty to James C. Hardin. W. Holmes Hardin claims upon this state of facts that he is a creditor of the estate of G. W. Melton, and that he should be allowed to set up both the mortgage of G. W. Melton to C. D. Melton and the Wright judgment, which he has paid. The force of the mortgage of G. W. Melton to C. D. Melton related only to the house and land upon which it was a lien. To restore to it now all the force it ever had would not aid petitioner in the collection of a claim against G. W. Melton's estate, for it would not constitute a lien upon any property of that estate. The same may be said of the Wright judgment. That was a judgment against C. D. Melton, obtained in a proceeding to which G. W. Melton was not a party. The doctrine of subrogation cannot impart new and enlarged scope to instruments, but only prevent extinguishment, in support of an equity. It is the relevation to another's right; nor is the right enlarged by the transfer. If, therefore, the mortgage and judgment were both restored to their original vigor, they could have no relation to the estate of G. W. Melton. G. W. Melton promised to pay the Wright judgment, and reserved money due C. D. Melton with which to do so. This promise did not make him liable on the judgment. The ground of his liability was his promise. This promise was made in November, 1871, and of course has been long since barred by the Statute of Limitations. It is therefore ordered that the prayer of the petitioner be denied."

To this decree Hardin filed the following reasons for exception: "(1) Because his honor erred in holding that the petitioner had no right to prove the amount paid by him in satisfaction of the Wright judgment against the estate of George W. Melton, when the petitioner was the assignee of the covenant of warranty of George W. Melton against incumbrances and for quiet enjoyment, and said covenant was broken by the levy of the execution issued on said judgment on the Chester property and the payment of the same by the petitioner, and he was entitled to prove the same according to the rank of his said debt under the Statute. (2) Because, the case of J. J. McClure, Administrator, v. M. A. Melton and Others, being still before the referee, the fund still in court arising from the sale of the real estate or the intestate, the administrator not having accounted for his administration, and there being a large sum of money in his hands undistributed, it was error in his honor not to allow the petitioner to prove in this action the breach of the covenant of warranty of George W. Melton, of which the petitioner was the assignee, and his payment of the Wright judgment, as a debt against the estate of the said G. W. Melton. (3) Because his honor erred in not holding that when W. Holmes Hardin paid the Wright judgment he was entitled to be subrogated to all the rights which the estate of C. D. Melton had in the agreement between C. D. and G. W. Melton of November 25, 1871, and through that instrument to prove it as a judgment debt against the estate of George W. Melton. (4) Because, when W. Holmes Hardin paid the Wright judgment, he paid the unpaid part of the purchase money of the Chester real estate, on which C. D. Melton held a mortgage of G. W. Melton, and Hardin is entitled to be subrogated to all the rights of the former in said mortgage, and has a right to have it kept alive for his benefit, so that he may prove it against the estate of George W. Melton as a mortgage debt; and his honor erred in not so finding. (5) That his honor erred in holding that the petitioner's claim was in any sense barred by the Statute of Limitations."

Mr. S. P. Hamilton, for appellant:

Having paid the balance of the purchase money, we claim:

1. To be subrogated to all the right in the four sealed notes and mortgage held by the estate of C. D. Melton necessary to reimburse us for that part of the purchase money which we have been obliged to pay, and to be allowed to prove the amount before the referee as a mortgage debt.

2. If it is objected that the mortgaged property has been conveyed away, the mortgage and notes canceled, and the mortgage has no longer a lien on the Chester property in the hands of the purchaser, then the debt for the purchase money was never paid by G. W. Melton and we are entitled to prove it as a sealed-note creditor.

3. That having paid the Wright judgment, a debt which G. W. Melton promised to pay as part of the purchase money of the Chester property by the agreement of 1871, we are entitled to set it up as a judgment in the distribution of assets of the estate. That for such purpose we are entitled to have the equity which C. D. Melton would have to set the judgment up as part of the purchase money of the Chester property through the agreement of 1871.

Burrows v. McWhann, 1 Desaus. Eq. 409; Sheldon, Subrogation, p. 10; Perkins v. Kershaw, 1 Hill, Ch. 351. See Eddy v. Traver, 6 Paige, 521, 3 L. ed. 1186.

Subrogation has been exercised in behalf of a stranger who pays the debt of another, if it appears that it was intended as a purchase of the debt and not satisfaction.

Bispham, Eq. § 837, p. 814.

If C. D. Melton was alive or his administrator after his death had been compelled to pay the Wright judgment, his brother being dead and insolvent, he could have disregarded the agreement of 1871, it being a promise of an inferior degree, it being a promise to pay a judgment, and through that the balance due on sealed notes and mortgage for the purchase money of the Chester property.

Fraser v. Hest, 2 Strobb. Eq. 250; Boulware v. Harrison, 4 Rich. Eq. 317.

The Statute of Limitations did not begin to run until the Wright judgment, being the balance of the purchase money, was paid, December, 1888. In the case of a surety or guarantor paying the debt of the principal debtor, the right of action accrues from the time of payment.

Peters v. Barnhill, 1 Hill, L. 234.

Messrs. G. W. S. Hart, G. J. Patterson and J. & J. Hemphill, for respondents.

McIver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal case in which the petition of appellant has been filed was an action brought by the plaintiff, as administrator of George W. Melton, deceased, against his heirs and creditors, to marshal the assets of the estate of said George W. Melton, which is insolvent, and it was commenced on the 17th of July, 1877. On the 24th of August, 1877, an order was passed in said case enjoining all creditors of George W. Melton "from suing on said claims, or prosecuting their actions at law thereon against said administrator, until the further order of this court." On the 13th of October, 1877, another order was passed, whereby, among other things, all creditors were required to prove their demands before the clerk on or before the 15th of January, 1878; and on the 14th of November, 1881, A. G. Brice was substituted as referee in place of the clerk, who, after holding several references, made his report on the 1st of February, 1884, ascertaining the debts proved, and classifying them according to their legal priorities. To this report some of the creditors filed exceptions to the classifications adopted by the referee, and his report with the exceptions thereto came before his honor Judge Wallace, who, on the 20th of May, 1885, rendered judgment sustaining the exceptions, but in all other respects confirming the report of the referee. From that judgment some of the mortgage creditors appealed, and on the 22d of April, 1886, the supreme court rendered judgment affirming the judgment of Judge Wallace. 24 S. C. 559. The case was then carried by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States, where the writ of error was dismissed [133 U. S. 880, 34 L. ed. 660], and the mandate from that court, together with the remittitur from the supreme court of this State, was filed in the circuit court on the 4th of June, 1890. In the mean time the real estate of the said George W. Melton had been sold, and a considerable portion of the proceeds of such sale remain in the hands of the clerk; and it is conceded that there are assets yet in the hands of the administrator, who has not yet formally accounted.

On the 25th of June, 1890, the appellant filed his petition in the cause, praying for leave to come in and prove his alleged claim against the estate of George W. Melton. His claim is based upon the following allegations contained 13 L. R. A.

in his petition: That Mrs. Wright, on the 15th of November, 1867, recovered a judgment against C. D. Melton, which became a lien on certain real estate in and adjoining the Town of Chester; that on the 25th of November, 1867, C. D. Melton conveyed said real estate to his brother, George W. Melton, with general warranty, and received from his brother four notes under seal, bearing that date, and secured by a mortgage of the premises; that when the last of these notes became payable, to wit, on the 25th of November, 1871, an agreement in writing not under seal, was entered into by the Melton brothers, whereby George W. Melton assumed the payment of certain specified judgments, including that in favor of Mrs. Wright, which had been previously obtained against C. D. Melton, and were liens upon said real estate, and thereupon the said C. D. Melton canceled and surrendered the said four notes, together with the mortgage to secure the payment of the same, to the said George W. Melton, but the record of said mortgage still remains uncanceled; that thereafter, to wit, in August, 1875, the said George W. Melton conveyed the said real estate, with the usual covenants of warranty, to certain trustees for the benefit of his wife and children; that in January, 1880, the said trustees, being duly authorized so to do, sold and conveyed the said real estate to the appellant, who bought in entire ignorance of the agreement above mentioned between the Melton brothers; that in April, 1881, the said appellant sold and conveyed the said real estate to James C. Hardin, with the usual covenants of warranty; that on the 18th of July, 1886, the Wright judgment, which had not been paid by George W. Melton in his lifetime or by anyone since his death, was levied upon the real estate in the possession of James C. Hardin, and the appellant, in exoneration of his covenant of warranty, having no defense to an action thereon, paid up the Wright judgment; wherefore the appellant claims that by the payment of said judgment he became the assignee of the covenant of warranty in the deed of George W. Melton to the said trustees; and that, having been compelled to pay the Wright judgment, which George W. Melton had undertaken to pay by his agreement of the 25th of November, 1871, the appellant stands as a surety to George W. Melton's estate, "and is entitled to set up said judgment in equity in his own favor in the marshaling of the assets of the estate of the intestate." Again, appellant claims that by the payment of the Wright judgment he in effect paid the balance of the purchase money due by George W. Melton for the said real estate, over which C. D. Melton held a mortgage, and appellant "is entitled to have the benefit of said mortgage as against the estate of George W. Melton, and to have leave to set it up as a mortgage debt against his estate, and to be subrogated to all the rights of the estate of C. D. Melton in said mortgage." To this petition the creditors of George W. Melton who have heretofore established their claims filed an answer, admitting all of the allegations of the petition except the following, which they deny: That appellant has become a creditor of the estate of George W. Melton; that appellant bought the real estate "in entire ignorance of the agreement" set forth in the petition; that petitioner had no defense to an action on the covenant of warranty contained in his deed to James C. Hardin; and that appellant, by the payment of the Wright judgment, became an assignee of the covenant of warranty in the deed from George W. Melton to the trustees. They also plead the Statute of Limitations.

It is conceded that the deed from George W. Melton to the trustees was a voluntary deed, based upon the consideration of natural love and affection only; and we presume that the deed from the trustees to the appellant contained no warranty. The testimony adduced on the part of the appellant was that of Maj. Hamilton, who stated that he was the attorney of George W. Melton, and as such drew the deed to the trustees, as well as the proceedings under which the trustees obtained leave to sell, and conducted the sale made by them to appellant, and that at that time the Wright judgment was supposed by all parties to be no judgment and no lien upon the property sold, and that the agreement between the Melton brothers, of the 25th of November, 1871, was not known to witness or anyone engaged in the case until it was produced in evidence by W. A. Clark in 1894. G. W. S. Hart, a witness examined for respondents, testified that he, with his partner, were the attorneys of Mrs. Wright, and they first learned that George W. Melton had assumed the payment of the Wright judgment some time in the latter part of 1881 or early part of 1882, prior to July, 1882; but the appellant, it is admitted, had no personal knowledge of such assumption at the time he purchased. It appears from the statements made in the case that C. D. Melton died in December, 1875, and George W. Melton in July, 1876, both being insolvent. The case was heard by his honor Judge Wallace, who rendered judgment dismissing the petition, and from his judgment the petitioner appeals upon the several grounds set out in the record. Inasmuch as the decree of the circuit judge, together with appellant's exceptions thereto, should be incorporated in the report of the case, it is unnecessary for us to state them particularly here.

The fundamental inquiry in the case is whether the appellant has any such claim against the estate of George W. Melton as entitled him to the aid of the court in enforcing it. Whatever claim he may have is unquestionably based upon the fact that he has paid the Wright judgment, the payment of which was assumed by George W. Melton by the agreement of 25th of November, 1871; but, as such payment was not made for the purpose of relieving the estate of C. D. Melton, but solely for the purpose of relieving the property from the lien of said judgment, which the appellant had bought with notice of the judgment, and conveyed with warranty to another, in order to perform his covenant of warranty, it is difficult for us to understand what equity he has to be subrogated to the rights which the holder of that judgment or to the rights which C. D. Melton's estate may have had against the estate of George W. Melton. There was no privity whatsoever between the appellant and C. D. Melton. He was not a surety of C. D. Melton, and in no way bound to pay said judgment for him. Indeed, practically, he paid no debt for which the estate of C. D. Melton was in equity and good conscience liable; for, though such estate was legally liable to pay such judgment, yet in equity and good conscience it was really payable out of the property which the appellant saw fit to buy with notice that it was subject to such lien. But, in addition to this, as the circuit judge well says, the judgment was against C. D. Melton and not against George W. Melton, who was never liable to pay the amount thereof as a judgment, but only liable by reason of his agreement of 25th of November, 1871, which was a mere simple contract obligation, and hence we do not see how it is possible, under any view of the case, for the Wright judgment to be set up as a judgment against the estate of George W. Melton.

As to appellant's claim to set up the mortgage originally given by George W. Melton to C. D. Melton to secure the payment of the purchase money of the Chester property, the same remark as that just made in reference to the Wright judgment may be made. That mortgage never was a lien on anything but the Chester property, and did not cover any other portion of the property belonging to the estate of George W. Melton; and hence it could not be proved as a mortgage debt against the assets of the estate of George W. Melton, under the principle decided in McClure v. Melton, 24 S. C. 559; but, if set up at all, it must take the same rank as the debt which it was given to secure, to wit, that of a sealed note.

It is necessary, therefore, to inquire whether the appellant can set up the sealed notes as a claim of that rank against the estate of George W. Melton. These notes were extinguished by the arrangement between the Melton brothers of the 25th of November, 1871, when they were canceled and surrendered to George W. Melton, and they cannot now constitute any legal cause of action against the estate of George W. Melton; and whatever equities C. D. Melton or his estate may have had, as intimated in the case of Hardin v. Clark, 32 S. C., at pages 495, 486, the appellant has no connection with, so far as we can see. He cannot claim as assignee of the covenant of warranty contained in the deed from C. D. Melton to George W. Melton, as was held in the case just cited, and we do not see what claim he could have against the estate of George W. Melton, as assignee of the covenant of warranty contained in the deed from George W. Melton to the trustees, for, that being a voluntary deed, and the measure of damages for breach of a covenant of warranty being fixed by statute at the amount of the purchase money paid, with interest from the time of the alienation, where there was nothing paid, nothing could have been recovered. If the trustees had been evicted they certainly could have recovered nothing from the estate of George W. Melton for the breach of the covenant of warranty contained in the voluntary deed under which they held; and the appellant, as their assignee, could have no higher rights than his assignors. If therefore, the appellant has any claim at all upon the estate of George W. Melton, it must arise from the agreement of 25th of November, 1871, whereby George W. Melton assumed the payment of the Wright judgment. But how can the appellant connect himself with that agreement? That was made for the benefit of C. D. Melton, and possibly might have inured to the benefit of the holder of the Wright judgment; but appellant is neither the assignee of C. D. Melton nor of the holder of the Wright judgment. It seems to us that the true position of the appellant is that of a purchaser of real estate under a quitclaim deed, without warranty, upon which there rested the lien of a judgment, of which he had not only constructive notice unquestionably, arising from the record, which would have been sufficient, but also, as it would seem, actual notice, if we are at liberty to refer to the decision in Hardin v. Clark, supra, offered in evidence in this case, at the time he purchased, and has seen fit to remove such lien by payment in order to protect himself against an action for breach of his covenant of warranty in his deed to his vendee. If this be so, then it is plain that he has no cause of action against the estate of George W. Melton; for, if so, then, in every case where a person who sells real estate covered by a judgment or other lien, of which his vendee has notice, and conveys the same without warranty, the vendor would be liable for any amount which the vendee might be called upon to pay for the purpose of removing such lien; and this could hardly be pretended, as it would destroy all distinctions between a quitclaim deed and a warranty deed. The fact that the vendor may have assumed the payment of such lien by a contract with a third person, with whom the vendee has not been able to connect himself cannot alter the case, as such third person might at any time he saw fit release the vendor from the performance of such contract. But, even if appellant could connect himself with the agreement of 25th of November, 1871, that would create a simple contract obligation, which could not be enforced by action after the lapse of six years.—not four, as contended by one of the counsel for respondents, as the change in the statutory period was effected by the Code, which was adopted 1st of March, 1870, and not by the Revised Statutes of 1872. So that it is clear that C. D. Melton or his administrator would have been barred of their action on such promise long before the petition in this case was filed, unless protected by the order of injunction; and the appellant, who certainly could not claim any higher rights, would be in like condition.

We must consider, then, the effect of the order of injunction, which was granted before the expiration of the six years. It will be observed that this order only restrained creditors from prosecuting their actions at law and did not prevent them from coming in and proving their demands in the case in which the order of injunction was granted. On the contrary, they were called upon to do so by a time fixed for that purpose.—15th of January, 1878. But the appellant not only failed to come in within six years from that date and present his demand, but he failed to do so within six years from the filing of the report on claims.—1st February, 1884; so that, even if appellant ever had any claim against the estate of George W. Melton, growing out of his promise to C. D. Melton to pay the Wright judgment, it was barred by the Statute before he filed his petition or presented his claim, which, according to what was held in Warren v. Raymond, 17 S. C., at pages 208, 204, must be regarded as the time when he commenced his action. The fact that the appellant filed his petition—commenced his action—within six years after he paid the judgment cannot affect the question, for, without considering the question whether he could have brought his action before making such payment, it is sufficient to say that he can claim no higher rights than C. D. Melton, and certainly he and his administrator were barred long before the appellant instituted this proceeding.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

1. A servant does not, by continuing his work at the command of the superintendent of the mill, assume the risk of injury from dangerous machinery which had, prior to the previous day, been enclosed, and which, upon his complaint, the superintendent promised to but did not re-enclose the previous night, although he promised in response to the servant's further complaint to fix it at noon, so as to prevent recovery for injuries received by coming in contact with the machinery during the forenoon.

NOTE.—Jury should determine the question of negligence.

If there is any conflict in the testimony in a negligence case, either as to the defendant's negligence or the contributory negligence of the person killed or injured by such negligence, the case must go to the jury; but if, upon either one of these points, there be no conflict, then it becomes a question of law, and a verdict should be directed. Mynning v. Detroit, L. & N. R. Co. 7 West. Rep. 324, 64 Mich. 93; Underhill v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 81 Mich. 43.

The great weight of authority, both English and 13 L. R. A.

American, favors the proposition that the question of negligence should be submitted to the jury. Questions of this nature are properly for their determination. Merritt v. Fitzgibbons, 29 Hun, 634; Hall v. Union Pac. R. Co. 16 Fed. Rep. 744; Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Jones, 11 Ill. App. 322; Milwaukee Nat. Bank v. City Bank, 108 U. contact with exposed machinery the danger of which is well known to him but the risk from which he has not assumed is not sufficient to show contributory negligence as matter of law if his work was in its immediate vicinity and required close attention, rapidity of action, and considerable moving about; but the question is for the jury.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Menominee County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. O. Fairchild, with Mr. B. J. Brown, for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Sawyer & Waite for defendant in error.

McGrath, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was case for negligence. The court below took the case from the jury on the ground that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, and plaintiff appeals. Roux was employed in defendant's saw-mill, upon the band-saw. It was his duty to take the cants from the saw, and guide them over the rollers, which took them to the gang-saw. The logs were brought to the saw from the north end of the mill, and upon a carriage-way, which extended about thirty feet to the south from the saw. Immediately east of this carriage-way, and running parallel therewith, was a system of rollers upon which the cants fell as they were cut from the logs. The first two rollers were dead, and stood three feet and six feet, respectively, to the south of the saw, and then came an open space of four feet, and then a system of five live rollers, forming a kind of a table through which the rollers projected. The power was communicated to these rollers, on the easterly ends thereof, by means of bevelgear wheels running into each other on the horizontal shaft along-side of the table, several inches below the top of the rollers. This shaft was operated by an upright shaft, coming through the floor from below, on the top of which was a bevel-gear wheel, which worked into a similar one keyed to the horizontal shaft. The head sawyer's place was near the second dead roller, south of the saw, and plaintiff's usual place was in and upon a space between the second dead roller and the first live roller, and his duty was to bring the board or cant down upon the rollers, and guide it upon its journey to the wheel-skids, which carried it to the edger or gang-saw. These wheel-skids were on the easterly side of the rollers. The carriage which brought the logs to the saw passed back and forth with each cut in front of plaintiff, and to the west of the rollers. East of the rollers was an open space, about four feet wide, at the point where the accident occurred. When the board or cant struck the rollers it would be between plaintiff and the carriage-way. Up to the day before the accident the gearing referred to had been covered by boards adjusted upon hinges and brackets. This covering had been split up and destroyed by the action of the boards in falling upon it, and in being carried along its surface, leaving the gearing exposed; and on the day before the accident plaintiff called the attention of the mill superintendent to this condition of the gearing, and the latter promised to attend to it that night. But when plaintiff went to the mill the next morning nothing had been done, and he again called the superintendent's attention to the exposed and dangerous condition of the gearing, and the superintendent stated that he had not had time, but that he would fix it at noon; directing plaintiff to go to work, but to take care of himself till noon, and that it would then be fixed. At about 10 o'clock of the same day plaintiff had his leg crushed by having his clothing caught, and his leg drawn into the bevel-gear wheels, at the junction of the upright

It is a sound rule of law that it is not contributory negligence not to look out for danger when there is no reason to apprehend any. Beach, Contrib. Neg. 41, and cases cited.

The authorities cited go much farther than the text, and state the rule to be that everyone has a right to presume that others, owing a special duty to guard against danger, will perform that duty. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Martin, 41 Mich. 667.

The question is one of some difficulty, and is not free from doubt. But in such cases the facts should be submitted to the jury. Palmer v. Harrison, 57 Mich. 183; Dundas v. Lansing, 75 Mich. 499.

Where the essential fact in a case is whether contributory negligence did or did not exist, and this depends upon inferences to be drawn from facts and circumstances about which honest, intelligent, and impartial men might differ, such a case should be submitted to the jury. Lowell v. Watertown Twp. 58 Mich. 568; Carver v. Detroit & S. Plank-road Co. 61 Mich. 584; Harris v. Clinton Twp. 7 West. Rep. 666, 84 Mich. 447; Little v. Grand Rapids Street R. Co. 78 Mich. 205; Brezee v. Powers, 80 Mich. 172.

What is the test of contributory negligence.

The test of contributory negligence or want of due care is not found in the failure to exercise the best judgment or to use the wisest precaution, but allowance may be made for the influences ordinarily governing human action, as what would under some circumstances be want of reasonable care may not be such under others. Lent v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 120 N. Y. 467.

The contributory negligence which prevents recovery for an injury must be such as co-operates in causing the injury and without which the injury could not have happened. Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. shaft with the horizontal shaft. These wheels move towards each other, while the other wheels on the horizontal shaft at the rollers move from each other. When injured, plaintiff was engaged in righting a cant, which was two inches thick, somewhere from twelve to fourteen inches in width, and about twenty-four feet long, the southerly end of which had gotten off the rollers and into the carriage-way, and plaintiff was endeavoring from the east side of the rollers to get the plank back upon the rollers. It appeared from the testimony that plaintiff was required to work rapidly; that nothing could be done at the band-saw till this plank was out of the way; that in the mean time three or four men were standing idle; and that the work at the gang-saws depended upon the progress of the work at the band-saw, and that it was not unusual for cants to require adjustment upon the rollers. It is urged that plaintiff's knowledge of the exposed and dangerous condition of this gearing was equal to that of his employers, and by continuing his work he assumed the risk.

This rule of law is not applicable to the circumstances of the present case. The risk to which plaintiff was exposed on the day of the injury was not one ordinarily incident to his employment. The danger was not one existing at the time of his engagement. It was a temporary peril. It did not arise until the day before the injury. In view of the danger this very machinery had been covered up. Plaintiff, acting as a prudent man should, had, on the evening before, and again on the very morning of the accident, notified defendant of the fact that the gearing was exposed, and defendant had, in recognition of the danger, and of plaintiff's exposure thereto, promised to replace the covering, and instructed the plaintiff to continue his work until noon, when it should be done. There was no voluntary assumption of the risk on the part of the plaintiff. He proceeded under protest. It was defendant's bounden duty, when notified, to re-cover this gearing. It was postponed to suit defendant's convenience, and not that of the plaintiff.

As was said in Greene v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., 81 Minn. 248: "If the emergencies of a master's business require him temporarily to use defective machinery, we fail to see what right he has in law or natural justice to insist that it shall be done at the risk of the servant, and not his own, when, notwithstanding the servant's objection to the condition of the machinery, he has requested or induced him to continue its use under a promise thereafter to repair it."

Mr. Cooley, in his work on Torts (sections 555, 559) says: "It has been often—and very justly—remarked, that a man may decline any exceptionally dangerous employment; but if he voluntarily engages in it he should not complain because it is dangerous. Nevertheless, where one has entered upon the employment and assumed the incidental risks, it is not reasonable to hold that other risks, which he is directed by the master to assume, are to be left to rest upon his shoulders merely because he did not take upon himself the responsibility of throwing up the employment, instead of obeying the order. Many considerations might reasonably induce the servant to hesitate under such circumstances. In many cases the consequences might be very serious should he refuse to obey a lawful command of the master; and any command may not be clearly and manifestly unlawful which directs the doing of nothing beyond the general scope of the business. The servant who refuses to obey must consequently expect to take upon himself the burden of showing a sufficient cause for the refusal. However clear the case might be to him, it might not be easy to make a showing satisfactory to third parties, who would naturally assume that the order was given in good faith, and that the master understood better than another the risks to be encountered in his business. The servant also, it may reasonably be assumed, would to some extent have his fears allayed by the commands of a master, whose duty it would be not to send him into danger, and who might therefore be supposed to know, when he gave the command, that the dangers were not such or so great as the servant had apprehended." "It is also negligence for which the master may be held responsible, if, knowing of any peril which is known to the servant also, he fails to remove it in accordance with assurances made by him to the servant that he will do so. This case may also be planted on contract, but it is by no means essential to do so. If the servant, having a right to abandon the service because it is dangerous, refrains from doing so in consequence of assurances that the danger shall be removed, the duty to remove the danger is manifest and imperative, and the master is not in the exercise of ordinary care unless or until he makes his assurances good. Moreover, the assurances remove all ground for argument that the servant by continuing the employment engages to assume its risks. So far as the particular peril is concerned, the implication of law is rebutted by the giving and accepting of the assurance; for nothing is plainer or more reasonable than that parties may, and should, where practicable, come to an understanding between themselves regarding matters of this nature."

Deering on Negligence, § 196, says: "Where injury results not from anything that is incident to the employment, but from a temporary peril, to which he is exposed by the negligent positive acts of the employer, he can recover."

1 Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 209, says: The servant cannot avoid responsibility "if he continues to work for any considerable time, knowing these facts, without being induced by his master to believe that a change will be made, and without making any complaint of such defects, or calling the attention of his master to them." The doctrine laid down by these authors is supported by a long line of well-considered cases.

In Greene v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co., supra, plaintiff was in the service of defendant as locomotive engineer on a train running between Minneapolis and Albert Lea. On reaching the former place in the morning with his train, upon examining his engine he discovered that the "chafing irons" between the engine and tender were partly broken off. He immediately reported the fact on the "repair-book" to the foreman of the round-house, whose duty it was to have the repairs made, and to direct what engine should go out. On returning in the evening to go out with his train he found the engine out, but not repaired. On inquiring of the foreman why the repairs had not been made, the reply in substance was that he had not had time. On plaintiff suggesting that he did not like to take out this engine, that it was not safe, the foreman replied that he was short of engines to do the work of the road, and had no other to send out, and added: "Proceed with that, and you can get it fixed at Lea, if you have time; if not, I will remedy it when you get back." The plaintiff did so, and on the way collided with another train (for which he does not appear to be responsible), and in attempting to escape was caught between the engine and tender, the defects in the "chafing irons" causing the engine to override the tender, and close up the gangway through which he was attempting to escape.

In Manufacturing Co. v. Morrissey, 40 Ohio St. 148, plaintiff was working upon a jointer which was out of repair.

In Clarke v. Holmes, 7 Hurlst. & N. 937, plaintiff was employed to oil dangerous machinery. When he entered upon the service certain of the machinery was fenced, but the fencing became broken by accident.

In Hough v. Texas & Pac. R. Co., 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612, there was a defect in the locomotive which plaintiff had in charge. "There can be no doubt," says the court, "that where a master has expressly promised to repair a defect the servant can recover for an injury caused thereby, within such a period of time after the promise as it would be reasonable to allow for its performance, and, as we think, for an injury suffered within any period which would not preclude all reasonable expectation that the promise might be kept."

In East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Duffield, 12 Lea, 68, plaintiff was supplied with a defective hammer to drive railroad spikes. He testified: "Of course, I was obliged to see that the hammer was broken. Any man who wasn't blind could have seen the condition of the hammer. I knew when I saw it that it wouldn't do to drive spikes with, and that is why I spoke to the section boss about it."

In Missouri Furnace Co. v. Abend, 107 Ill. 44, a locomotive foot-board was defective, from which deceased fell, while oiling the engine.

In Parody v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., 15 Fed. Rep. 205, the injury was occasioned by a defective draw-bar.

In Laning v. New York Cent. R. Co., 49 N. Y. 521, the court says: "Where the servant has full and equal knowledge with the master that the machinery or materials employed are defective, or that the fellow servant is incompetent, and he remains in the service, this may constitute contributory negligence; but if it appears that the master has promised to amend the defect, or other like inducement to remain has been held out to the servant, the mere fact of his continuing in the employment does not, of itself, as matter of law, exonerate the master from liability, but the question of contributory negligence is one of fact for the jury." See also Pieart v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (Iowa, 1891) 47 N. W. Rep. 1017; Kane v. Northern Cent. R. Co. 128 U. S. 91, 32 L. ed. 339; District of Columbia v. McElligott, 117 U. S. 621, 631, 29 L. ed. 946-949; Gulveston, H. & 13 L. R. A.

S. A. R. Co. v. Drew, 59 Tex. 13; Patterson v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. 76 Pa. 389; Mehan v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. 73 N. Y. 585; Booth v. Boston & A. R. Co. Id. 38; Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co. 102 Mass. 572-578; Greenleaf v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co. 33 Iowa, 53.

This principle has been recognized and approved by this court. In Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205, the servant was justified in obeying the orders of his superior. Justice Cooley (p. 212) says: "The risk was not fairly upon the servant's shoulders," and again: "We agree with the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, that when a servant, in obedience to the orders of his superior, incurs the risks of machinery which, though dangerous, is not so much so as to threaten immediate injury, or where it is reasonably probable that it may be safely used by extraordinary caution or skill the case is not to be regarded as one of concurring negligence,"—citing Patterson v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. 76 Pa. 389-394.

In Snoobdu v. Ward, 40 Mich. 420-422, the court, after laying down other general rules, says: "If the servant, with full knowledge of the facts, and understanding the risks occasioned thereby, in the absence of any promise by the master to remedy the same, consents to and remains in the master's employ, then he voluntarily incurs such increased risks." See also Lytle v. Chicago & W. M. R. Co. 84 Mich. 289. Jones v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co., 49 Mich. 573, recognizes the right of the servant to show that he did not consent or agree to the change or performance of extra duties, and that he did not freely and voluntarily enter upon a discharge of new duties imposed. The new duties in that case involved extra hazard.

It is insisted, however, that the dangerous condition and character of this machinery was known to plaintiff, and that he was guilty of concurring negligence in approaching it; that he did not exercise ordinary care, and might have gone around on the other side of the rollers, and thus have avoided the danger. Knowledge of the existence of a defect or danger, while it is evidence of contributory negligence, is not conclusive. In the cases already referred to the existence of the danger was known to plaintiff, and in all of them it is held that the question of defendant's contributory negligence is for the jury.

In Coombs v. New Bedford Cordage Co., 102 Mass. 572-578, it is said: "Inattention which has led to a collision or a fall, if duly accounted for, or if excused, or occasioned by the nature of the employment, is no hindrance to a recovery when the injury is legally imputable to a defect without which the fall would not have occurred, or the collision would have been harmless. Thus attention might be prevented by the darkness of night, or by the duty to couple cars at a particular moment, or, as is contended in this case, to separate them. Knowledge is only one piece of evidence bearing on the question of negligence; and how much it should bear depends on all the circumstances, and is for the consideration of the jury."

In Byerly v. Anamosa, 79 Iowa, 204, held, that the question of plaintiff's contributory negligence in driving a horse along a street with knowledge of conditions rendering it dangerous was for the jury, as such act was not per se negligence.

In Harris v. Clinton Twp., 64 Mich. 447, 7 West. Rep. 666, the court says: "It is not a universal rule that the defendant is excused from liability merely because the plaintiff, knowing of the danger caused by defendant's negligence, voluntarily incurs that danger. If the defendant has so acted as to induce the plaintiff, acting with reasonable prudence, to incur the danger, or if plaintiff, by defendant's negligence, is placed in a situation of peril, to escape which he voluntarily incurs another danger, the defendant is liable, although the plaintiff may not, in the emergency, have pursued the course which ordinary prudence would have dictated."

In Kane v. Northern Cent. R. Co., supra, the court says: "In determining whether an employé has recklessly exposed himself to peril, or failed to exercise the care for his personal safety that might reasonably be expected, regard must always be had to the exigencies of his position,—indeed, to all the circumstances of the particular occasion."

In Greenleaf v. Dubuque & S. C. R. Co., supra, the court says: "If the service to be performed by Macy (the deceased) was of a character to require that his exclusive attention should be fixed upon it, and that he should act with rapidity and promptness, it could hardly be expected that he should always bear in mind the existence of the defect, or be prepared at all times to avoid it."

In Snow v. Housatonic R. Co., 8 Allen, 441, the superstructure or roadbed between the tracks of the defendant's road where it crossed the highway at a point where the trains were made up, was such that it was necessary for the person whose duty it was to unshackle the cars or to fasten them together to pass and repass over the space covered with plank between the tracks frequently, and with rapidity, and with his attention in great degree diverted from the surface over which he passed, and directed to the special duty or service of separating and uniting the cars, in order to prepare the trains for transit. While engaged in that service in the usual and ordinary mode, plaintiff was thrown down by reason of the defect in the road. The court says: "As the plaintiff was in the discharge of his duty in placing himself in a perilous position,—a duty the performance of which was known to and sanctioned by the defendants,—the fact that he was in such position has no tendency to prove that he was negligent or careless. The question of due care in such case depends on the manner in which the plaintiff performed the duty incumbent on him,—whether he acted with due skill and caution, and conducted himself in the usual and ordinary way in which similar acts are done by persons engaged in like employment; and on other considerations of like character, which do not fall within the range of ordinary observation and experience. The question of negligence was therefore a subject of evidence, and should have been submitted, with proper instructions, to the jury for their determination. Nor do we think that it was any the less a question of fact to be decided by the jury because it appeared that the plaintiff had previous knowledge of the defect in the road which caused the accident. Reed v. Northfield, 13 Pick. 98; Smith v. Lowell, 6 Allen, 40. This certainly was a circumstance to be taken into consideration, but by no means a decisive one. If the service to be performed by the plaintiff was of a character to require that his exclusive attention should be fixed upon it, and that he should act with rapidity and promptness, it could hardly be expected that he should always bear in mind the existence of the defect, or be prepared at all times to avoid it."

In Malloy v. Walker Twp., 77 Mich. 448, the court says: "If it was the negligence of the defendant in not repairing the highway which placed the deceased and those under his charge in a precarious condition, no negligence could be imputed to the deceased if, acting upon that occasion, as it appeared to him to be, for the safety of himself and party in his charge, he did not take the precaution which, upon consideration, a more prudent man might have taken. At least it was a question for the jury, and fairly submitted." Nothing short of gross negligence on the part of the injuring party can relieve the injured party from the exercise of care. The promise made by defendant in this case did not absolve plaintiff from the exercise of reasonable care while about this dangerous machinery; but what shall constitute such care in a given case must necessarily depend upon all the facts and circumstances of that case. He is held to that degree of care which every prudent man is expected to employ under similar circumstances in carrying on the same kind of business. Here the gearing had been covered, because it was dangerous in its exposed condition, and because the employes of the mill, and this very plaintiff, were likely to come into contact with it. Plaintiff remonstrated, but he was directed to continue work which involved the probability of this contact. This is but a necessary inference from the plaintiff's complaint and the superintendent's reply. The performance of plaintiff's duty required him to go in the vicinity of this machinery. His work afforded very little opportunity for deliberation. It was necessary that he should act promptly. Hesitation was not expected of him, and the degree of care required of him with respect to his own personal safety must be measured to some extent by the exactions of his employment, by its demands upon his attention, and by his devotion to its duties. His diligence and zeal in his master's service should count in his favor, and not against him, in determining this question.

In Harris v. Clinton Twp., supra, the court says: "Upon this issue there are two reasonable, but different, views which might be taken; and therefore the question should have been submitted to the jury. The facts that Soper knew the location of the highway; that it was crooked, and that there were no guides or barriers; that it was overflowed, and the water had raised since he last passed over it; and knew that some hazard was incurred in attempting to pass over it,—did not conclusively show that it was negligence in him to make the attempt. Of course, the increased hazard from the rising of the water called upon Soper to exercise increased caution, and may have been a circumstance which, in the opinion of some persons, should have determined him not to make the attempt at all, but whether it was or not, in connection with the other facts, should have been left with the jury to determine." "Where there is a chance, upon the facts shown, for ordinary candid and intelligent men to arrive at different conclusions, the question of contributory negligence is to be determined by the jury. Adams v. Iron Cliffs Co. 78 Mich. 271; Luke v. Wheat Min. Co. 71 Mich. 364, and Teipel v. Hilsendegen, 44 Mich. 461."

This is one of those cases where two reasonable and different views might be taken, and two men of equal candor might differ. In my judgment, the court below erred in taking the case from the jury, and in ruling that as a matter of law the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence.

The judgment will be reversed, and a new trial had, with costs of this court to plaintiff.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

Elias R. HUNNEWELL

v.

J. W. DUXBURY et al.

(.....Mass.....)

False statements in a certificate required by Stat. 1884, chap. 330, § 3, to be filed with the commissioner of corporations to enable a foreign corporation to do business in Massachusetts, will not render the persons signing it liable for deceit to one who, relying upon them, takes the corporation's notes and thereby suffers loss.

(September 2, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendants from an order of the Superior Court for Suffolk County

overruling a demurrer to the second count in the declaration in an action brought to recover damages from defendants for deceit in making false representations which induced plaintiff to take certain worthless notes, and exceptions by them to rulings made during the trial of the action, which resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Demurrer and exceptions sustained.

The second count of the declaration alleged, in substance, that defendants were officers of a Maine corporation; that they signed and swore to a false statement or certificate therein representing that the corporation's capital stock of $150,000 was all paid in, and that patents of the value of $149,650 had been transferred to it, and caused the certificate to be filed with the commissioner of corporations; that plain-

NOTE.—Proximate and remote cause of damage.

It is an elementary rule governing both personal and corporate liability that only such damage can be recovered as is traceable directly to the wrongful act. "A long series of judicial decisions has defined proximate or immediate and direct damages to be the ordinary and natural results of the negligence, such as are usual and as therefore might have been expected." Henry v. Southern Pac. R. Co. 50 Cal. 183.

The general rule is that the party who commits a trespass or other wrongful act is liable only for the direct injury resulting from such act, although such resulting injury could not have been contemplated as a probable result of the act done. Wellington v. Downer Kerosene Oil Co. 104 Mass. 64; Salisbury v. Herchenroder, 106 Mass. 458, 8 Am. Rep. 354; Patten v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 32 Wis. 524, 36 Wis. 413; Bowas v. Pioneer Tow Line, 2 Sawy. 21; Ward v. Vanderbilt, 34 How. Pr. 144; Eten v. Luyster, 60 N. Y. 252; Lane v. Atlantic Works, 111 Mass. 126; Hart v. Western R. Corp. 13 Met. 99, 104; Keenan v. Cavanaugh, 44 Vt. 298; Collard v. Southeastern R. Co. 7 Hurlst. & N. 79; Little v. Boston & M. R. Co. 66 Me. 239; Metallic Comp. Cast. Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. 109 Mass. 277; Perley v. Eastern R. Co. 98 Mass. 414; Williams v. Vanderbilt, 28 N. Y. 217; Kellogg v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Wis. 223, 7 Am. Rep. 69.

In the language of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, to visit upon the defendant all the consequences of his wrongful act "would set society on edge, and fill the courts with useless and injurious litigation. It is impossible to compensate for all losses, and the law therefore aims at a just discrimination, which will impose upon the party causing them the proportion of them that a proper view of his acts and the attending circumstances would dictate." Fleming v. Beck. 48 Pa. 300, 313; 1 Sedgw. Dam. § 113.

The law cannot undertake to trace back the chain of causes indefinitely, for it is obvious that this would lead to inquiries far beyond human power and wisdom—in fact, infinite in their scope. It therefore stops at the first link in the chain of causation, and looks only to the person who is the proximate cause of the injury. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 9.

The general rule is, that the damage to be recovered must be the natural and proximate consequence of the act complained of. 2 Greenl. Ev. § 256.

It is not enough if it be the natural consequence; it must be both natural and proximate. Richardson v. Dunn, 8 C. B. N. S. 664.

To maintain an action for special damages, they must be the legal and natural consequences arising from the tort, and not from the wrongful act of a third party remotely induced thereby. Crain v. Petrie, 6 Hill, 522.

The negligent burning of a house, and the spreading of the fire to a neighboring house, and the burning thereof, do not give the owner of the last house a cause of action against the owner of the house in which the fire originated. The damages are too remote. Ryan v. New York Cent. R. Co. 35 N. Y. 210.

It is not easy at all times to determine what are proximate and what are remote damages. In Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 408, Judge Ruggles defines the damages for which a party is liable as those which are the natural or necessary consequences of his acts.

tiff manufactured goods for the corporation for which he was asked to take its notes; that plaintiff caused an examination of the records in the commissioner's office to be made and thereby learned of the certificate and its contents; that, believing the same to be true, he accepted the notes; that the statements were false and the corporation was insolvent, and that plaintiff was unable to collect the amount of the notes.

The further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Charles R. Darling, with Messrs. W. F. Slocum and W. S. Slocum, for appellants:

A statement filed under the Act of 1884 referred to cannot be made the subject of a private action for damages for false representation against the signers of the statement.

A person making a representation is only accountable for its truth or honesty to the very person or persons whom he seeks to influence; no one else has a right to rely on the representation, and to allege its falsity as a wrong to him.

Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. *493; Kerr, Fraud & Mistake, 93; Brckett v. Griswold, 112 N. Y. 454.

Thus, a misrepresentation by A to B, as to A's solvency, gives no right of action to a third person to whom the representation is repeated without A's authority.

Rawlings v. Bean, 80 Mo. 614. See also McCracken v. West, 17 Ohio 16; Harding v. Commercial Loan Co. 84 Ill. 251; Wells v. Cook, 16 Ohio St. 67.

Such statements cannot be said to be public records; and no rights are given by the statute to the public to examine them, or to the information therein contained. It is a matter entirely between the corporation and the commissioner of corporations. This Statute is entirely different from those Acts which require officers of corporations to make detailed reports as to the condition of the corporation annually. It is at least doubtful whether there is any liability under the latter class of statutes, apart from the express provision referred to.

Brckett v. Griswold, supra; Fogg v. Pew, 10 Gray, 409; Pub. Stat. chap. 106, §§ 59, 60, cl. 5.

The statement under the Statute may be likened to testimony given by a witness in court. A bystander would not be entitled to rely on witness's statement in a subsequent transaction with him, and then allege its falsity as a fraud upon him.

See Morris v. Talcott, 96 N. Y. 100.

A further reason why a statement under the Statute should not be recognized as the foundation of an action against the officers of the corporation individually is that it is the company, and not the officers, that is required to file the statement.

See Van Weel v. Winston, 115 U. S. 228, 29 L. ed. 384.

The case at bar is to be distinguished from the following:

(1) Where officers of a corporation publish a prospectus with the intention of attracting subscribers. The purpose is to induce people to invest.

(2) Statements to commercial agencies, which are made to obtain credit.

Macaulay v. McKinley, 99 N. Y. 353; Long v. West, 81 Kan. 298; Bradley v. Poole, 98 Mass. 169.

The rule by which a person is liable for representations made by him as of his own knowledge, without other evidence of fraud, is not properly applicable in this case.

That doctrine is substantially identical with the equitable doctrine which holds the mere falsity of a representation sufficient ground for relief without regard to fraud.

The equitable doctrine is limited to cases between contracting parties, i. e., the principals in the contract; consequently, the doctrine in question should be similarly limited.

In equity a contract will be rescinded, or other similar relief granted, on account of a representation which is false in fact, however innocently made.

In England this doctrine is supposed to be limited to rescission cases. But the distinction in the application of the doctrine, between claims for rescission and for damages is not well maintained in England, and is still less so in this country.

Barker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action is tort for deceit in inducing the plaintiff to take notes of a corporation by false and fraudulent representations alleged to have been made to him by the defendants, that the capital stock of the corporation amounting to $150,000 had been paid in, and that patents for electrical advertising devices of the value of $149,650 had been transferred to it.

From the exceptions it appears that the corporation was organized in January, 1885, under the laws of Maine, and engaged in business in Massachusetts. That it filed with the commissioner of corporations a certificate dated August 11, 1885, required by the Statute of 1884, chap. 330, § 3, signed by the defendants, with a jurat stating that on that date they had severally made oath that the certificate was true to the best of their knowledge and belief. That before the plaintiff took the notes the contents of this certificate had been communicated to him by an attorney whom he had employed to examine the records, and that he relied upon its statements in accepting the notes. There was no other evidence of the making of the alleged representations.

The main question is whether the plaintiff can maintain an action of deceit for alleged misstatements contained in the certificate. In the opinion of a majority of the court this question should have been decided adversely to the plaintiff. The execution by the defendants of the certificate to enable the corporation to file it under Stat. 1884, chap. 330, § 3, was too remote from any design to influence the action of the plaintiff to make it the foundation of an action of deceit.

To sustain such an action misrepresentations must either have been made to the plaintiff individually, or as one of the public, or as one of a class to whom they are in fact addressed, or have been intended to influence his conduct in the particular of which he complains.

This certificate was not communicated by the defendants or the corporation to the public or the plaintiff. It was filed with a state official for the definite purpose of complying with a requirement imposed as a condition precedent to the right of the corporation to act in Massachusetts. Its design was not to procure credit among merchants, but to secure the right to transact business in the State.

The terms of the Statute carry no implication of such a liability. Statutes requiring similar statements from domestic corporations have been in force here since 1829, and whenever it was intended to impose a liability for false statements contained in them there has been an express provision to that effect; and a requisite of the liability has uniformly been that the person to be held signed knowing the statement to be false. Stat. 1829, § 90; Rev. Stat. chap. 38, § 28; Gen. Stat. chap. 60, § 30; Stat. 1870, chap. 224, § 38, cl. 5; Pub. Stat. chap. 106, § 60, cl. 5.

To hold that the Statute of 1884, chap. 330, § 3, imposes upon those officers of a foreign corporation who sign the certificate which is a condition of its admission the added liability of an action of deceit, is to read into the Statute what it does not contain.

If such an action lies it might have been brought in many instances upon representations made in returns required of domestic corporations, and yet there is no instance of such an action in our reports. In Fogg v. Pew, 10 Gray, 409, it is held that the misrepresentations must have been intended and allowed by those making them to operate on the mind of the party induced and have been suffered to influence him.

In Bradley v. Poole, 98 Mass. 169, the representations proved and relied on were made personally by the defendant to the plaintiff in the course of the negotiation for the shares the price of which the plaintiff sought to recover.

Felker v. Standard Yarn Co., 148 Mass. 226, was an action under Pub. Stat. chap. 106, § 60, to enforce a liability explicitly declared by the Statute.

Nor is there any English case which goes to the length necessary to sustain the plaintiff's action. The English cases fall under two heads: (1) those of officers, members or agents of corporations, who have issued a prospectus or report addressed to and circulated among shareholders or the public for the purpose of inducing them to take shares; (2) those persons who, to obtain the listing of stocks or securities upon the stock exchange in order that they may be more readily sold to the public, have made representations to the officials of the exchange, which in due course have been communicated to buyers.

Bagshaw v. Seymour, 4 C. B. N. S. 873; Watson v. Charlemont, 8 Q. B. 856; Bedford v. Bagshaw, 4 Hurlst. & N. 537; Clarke v. Dickson, 6 C. B. N. S. 453; Jarrett v. Kennedy, 6 C. B. 319; Campbell v. Fleming, 1 Ad. & El. 40; Peck v. Derry, L. R. 37 Ch. Div. 541, and 14 App. Cas. 337; Angus v. Clifford [1891] L. R. 2 Ch. Div. 449.

In these cases the representations were clearly addressed to the plaintiffs, among others, of the public or of a class, and were plainly intended and calculated to influence their action in the specific matter in which they claimed to have been injured. So, too, in the American cases relied on to support the action. Morgan v. Skiddy, 62 N. Y. 319; Terwilliger v. Great Western U. Teleq. Co. 59 Ill. 249; Paddock v. Fletcher, 42 Vt. 389. The numerous cases cited in the note to Pinsley v. Freeman, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. 1820, are of the same character.

In the case at bar the certificate was made and filed for the definite purpose, not of influencing the public, but of obtaining from the State a specific right, which did not affect the validity of its contracts, but merely relieved its agents in Massachusetts of a penalty. It was not addressed to or intended for the public, and was known to the plaintiff only from the search of his attorney. It could not have been intended or designed by the defendants that the plaintiff should ascertain its contents and be induced by them to take the notes. It is not such a representation made by one to another with intent to deceive as will sustain the action. Its statements are in no fair sense addressed to the person who searches for, discovers, and acts upon them, and cannot fairly be inferred or found to have been made with the intent to deceive him.

This view of the law disposes of the case and makes it unnecessary to consider the other questions raised at the trial.

Demurrer to the second count sustained. Exceptions sustained.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

James L. McCASKILL, Appt.,

CONNECTICUT SAVINGS BANK.

(.... Conn.)

1. A savings bank pass-book is not a negotiable instrument, either by itself or in connection with an order signed by the depositor directing payment to a third person or bearer, nor can it be made so by contract. The account may be transferred but the assignee takes it subject to be equities and defenses between the original parties, in the absence of facts creating an estoppel.
2. The entry by a savings bank of a credit in a pass-book will not estop it from denying that a deposit was made as against an assignee of the account where the entry was procured by fraud and the bank made it without knowledge of the material facts or any intention that the representation should be acted on, especially where the assignee is not a bona fide holder.
3. A finding by the trial court upon a distinct issue of fact whether or not the assignee of a savings bank pass-book is a bona fide holder is conclusive.

NOTE.—Possession of bank pass-book not conclusive of right to draw deposit.

Agreements between a savings bank and its depositors that the moneys intrusted to the bank shall be paid to anyone presenting the pass-book will not relieve the bank from the legal consequences of its failure to exercise reasonable precaution in paying the deposit to a party having possession of the pass-book. Kinball v. Norton, 59 N. H. 1, 47 Am. Rep. 171.

And the bank, in making payment to one having no other evidence of right to receive it, must show some valid contract by virtue of which it was understood such a payment was authorized. Smith v. Brooklyn Sav. Bank, 1 Cent. Rep. 801, 101 N. Y. 58.

A rule of a savings bank, that payments made to any person producing the pass-book shall be valid does not relieve it from liability for negligent payment made thereon after it is informed of the death of the depositor; where another rule provides that upon such death the deposit shall be paid to the depositor's legal representative. Farmer v. Manhattan Sav. Inst. 39 N. Y. S. R. 523.

Where the officials of a savings bank, acting in good faith, duly pay to a party presenting its pass-book under circumstances in no wise calculated to engender suspicion, and where, in making such payment, there is present the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, their action will be protected and the payment held good. Appleby v. Erie County Sav. Bank, 62 N. Y. 12; Hayden v. Brooklyn Sav. Bank, 15 Abb. N. S. 297; Allen v. Williamsburgh Sav. Bank, 69 N. Y. 317.

Irrespective of any by-laws a bank would be protected by a payment made in good faith to the holder of the pass-book. Sullivan v. Lewiston Sav. Inst. 56 Me. 507; Eaves v. People's Sav. Bank, 27 Conn. 234; Heath v. Portsmouth Sav. Bank, 46 N. H. 78; Camp's App. 36 Conn. 88, 4 Am. Rep. 39; Tillinghast v. Wheaton, 8 R. I. 536, 5 Am. Rep. 621.

The doctrine of the principal case has been previously vindicated by a decision in the New York Court of Appeals, which distinctly holds that the pass-book of a savings bank is not negotiable pa-

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount credited on a savings bank pass-book which had been assigned to plaintiff. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. George D. Watrous and Edward G. Buckland, for appellant:

The ruling that the plaintiff was not the bona fide holder of book and order is a conclusion of law and is reviewable by this court.

White v. Brown, 14 How. Pr. 286; Hamilton v. Fought, 34 N. J. L. 192.

The question of bona fides and conversely of mala fides presupposes a duty which has been done or left undone. What duty rested upon the plaintiff in connection with the transfer of the pass-book to his possession is therefore a question of law.

Nolan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. R. Co. 1 New Eng. Rep. 826, 53 Conn. 471.

The finding that the plaintiff had "reason to believe" that Harrison's possession of the book is tainted with fraud or illegality, all the facts having been ascertained, is also a conclusion of law and likewise reviewable.

Burns v. Erben, 40 N. Y. 466; Bulkeley v. Keteltas, 6 N. Y. 387.

per, and that its possession constitutes in itself no evidence of a right to draw money thereon. It merely imports a liability of the bank to the depositor for the moneys deposited and an agreement to repay them at such time and in such manner as the depositor shall direct. Allen v. Williamsburgh Sav. Bank, supra.

That as between the depositor and the bank, it may be shown that an entry in a pass-book is an error, and that the depositor is not entitled to receive the sum stated, or that it has been paid, or that it has been taken from the bank by legal process, can hardly be controverted. Salem Bank v. Gloucester Bank, 17 Mass. 129; Chocheo Nat. Bank v. Haskell, 61 N. H. 116; Merchants Bank v. Marine Bank, 3 Gill, 196; Story, Ag. § 115.

Where one receives credit on his pass-book for a check found afterwards not to be good, the entry may be canceled. National Gold Bank & T. Co. v. McDonald, 51 Cal. 64.

Deposit may be transferred by assignment and the delivery of the pass-book.

A transfer of a deposit may be shown by a delivery of the bank-book to the grantee, accompanied by an assignment thereof. As there can be no manual delivery of the credit which the depositor has with the bank, the delivery of the book, which represents the deposit and is the only evidence of the contract together with the assignment, operates as a transfer of the existing fund, and is all the delivery of which the subject is capable. Pierce v. Boston Five Cents Sav. Bank, 129 Mass. 425.

Entry in pass-book may be regarded as an admission.

Ordinarily, whenever a deposit is made the amount and date thereof are entered by the cashier or teller in the pass-book of the depositor, and such entries when made by the proper officer bind the bank as admissions. In some cases it has been held that they become conclusive upon the bank like an account stated, when the bank-book is balanced. Morse, Banks & Bankins, 3d ed. § 291. See note to Gifford v. Rutland Sav. Bank (Vt.) 11 L. R. A. 704.

F. S. R.

If not, they are conclusions of facts from facts specially found, and thus are reviewable.

Good faith rather than diligence is the standard by which a holder's right is determined, and diligence or want of it is immaterial, except so far as it legitimately tends to establish or rebut the claim of a bona fide possession of the paper.

Ladd v. Franklin, 37 Conn. 64; Hamilton v. Vought, 34 N. J. L. 192.

A certificate of deposit is negotiable.

Why, then, is not a pass-book?

The elements here present are sufficient to constitute an estoppel in pais, to wit:

1. A false representation.
2. Ignorance of the truth, the result of inexcusable negligence.

3. The plaintiff relying on the representation and being ignorant of the facts.

4. The representation having been made with the intention that it should be acted upon.

5. Plaintiff having been induced to act upon the representation to his prejudice.

Even if the plaintiff had means of knowing the falsity of the matter, he was justified in acting upon the clear, positive representations contained in the pass-book.

This doctrine of estoppel applies independently of the question of negotiability. It has grown up and has become firmly fixed in our law in the cases of transfers of stock, warehouse receipts, bills of lading, elevator receipts and non-negotiable notes. In every transaction where parties contemplate, or where usage supposes them to have contemplated, the possibility of transfer, this doctrine applies.

Mr. C. R. Ingersoll, for appellee:

The deposit book of a savings-bank depositor is not a negotiable instrument in law.

Com. v. Reading Sav. Bank, 138 Mass. 16; 13 L. R. A.

Smith v. Brooklyn Sav. Bank, 1 Cent. Rep. 801, 101 N. Y. 80; Eaves v. People's Sav. Bank, 27 Conn. 233; Witte v. Vincenot, 43 Cal. 325; Moore v. Ulster Bank, 11 Ir. C. L. Rep. 512.

Negligence on the part of the Bank is not found. And negligence is a fact that must be found by the trial court.

Fiske v. Forsyth Dyeing L. & B. Co. 57 Conn. 118.

Mala fides, and not mere negligence, is necessary to invalidate the title to ordinary commercial negotiable paper. But the negligence is still proper evidence of the mala fides. And so all the circumstances of the taking enter into the settling of that conclusion of fact.

Credit Co. v. Howe Mach. Co. 54 Conn. 384; Seybel v. National Currency Bank, 54 N. Y. 283; Murray v. Lardner, 69 U. S. 2 Wall. 110, 17 L. ed. 857; Potts v. Meyer, 74 N. Y. 594; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 777; 2 Parsons, Notes & Bills, 279; 1 Parsons, Notes & Bills, 258.

But this rule of mala fides is confined to negotiable paper. A party claiming an estoppel by negligence must prove himself to be free from negligence.

2 Story, Eq. § 1553 b; Trenton Bkg. Co. v. Duncan, 86 N. Y. 221.

Loomis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Upon the trial of this case, and upon the facts contained in the finding, the plaintiff's contentions relative to five questions were overruled by the court, and furnish the only foundation for this appeal; but as four of the questions embrace only two subjects, the questions for our review may well be reduced to three, as follows: First. Is the Savings Bank pass-book, upon which the suit is predicated, a negotiable instrument? Second. Is the defendant Bank estopped from showing that the $750 which appears on that book to the credit of Michael Harrison was in fact never deposited with the Bank, nor any part of it? Third. Did the court err in holding that the plaintiff was not a bona fide holder of the pass-book?

1. The first question we are constrained to answer in the negative. The pass-book was not negotiable by itself, nor by virtue of the written order signed by the pretended depositor directing payment to J. J. Stuart & Co. or bearer. In Eaves v. People's Sav. Bank, 27 Conn. 239, the bank undertook to defend against the suit in favor of a depositor to recover the money deposited, upon the ground that the amount had been paid in good faith to a person who brought the original pass-book to the bank, accompanied with an order good on its face, though in fact forged. This court held that the forged power of attorney was no power, and that the presentation of the book itself had no greater effect, because it was not negotiable. There was not a very full discussion of this point, but the court held that the rights of the depositors would be very insecure if the pass-book was held negotiable. It may be suggested that, if the book was accompanied with a genuine order for the payment of the money, the rights of the depositor could not be affected, and that therefore the reasoning could not apply to the case at bar; but, if we concede that the rights of the particular depositor, who had given a genuine order to pay the money to another, would not be rendered insecure by holding the instrument negotiable, yet it would seriously affect the rights of the depositors in their relation to each other and to the assets of the Bank. A reference to some decisions of this court in respect to these relations will render the point more clear. In Coite v. Society for Savings, 82 Conn. 173, it was held that savings banks were "incorporated agencies for receiving and loaning money on account of the owners; that they have no stock and no capital; and that they are merely places of deposit, where money can be left to remain or be taken out at the pleasure of the owner." In Osborn v. Byrne, 48 Conn. 155, it was held that "a savings bank is an agent for the depositors, receiving and loaning their money; and its losses are their losses, and are to be borne by them equally, according to their interest. The depositors in savings banks bear the same relation to each other and to the assets of the bank that stockholders in other monetary institutions do to each other and to the property of the bank." In Bunnell v. Collinsville Sav. Soc., 38 Conn. 203, the defendant bank having met with a loss equal to twenty-four per cent of the deposits, the directors reduced the amount to each depositor's credit in that proportion. In an action by a depositor to recover of the bank the amount so deducted, it was held that the defendant was merely the agent of the plaintiff to receive and hold his money, and that the loss was occasioned by his own act, through the instrumentality of his agent, and that he could not recover. Now, suppose in the last case the plaintiff, before or after the act of the directors reducing the amount of the deposits, had sold his book, and given the proper order to some bona fide purchaser for full value, and the latter had brought such a suit against the bank to recover the original deposit in full, could he recover any better than the original depositor? If he could, then the act of one depositor could injuriously affect the rights of all the others, for they would have to bear the additional reduction in consequence of paying one in full. It seems to us that no principle can be accepted which admits of such inequality and injustice, and it is contrary to the principles already adopted by this court in the decisions referred to.

In the case at bar, by reason of fraud, forgery, and falsehood, Harrison obtained two pass-books from the bank, upon which appeared credits amounting to $1,250, when in truth nothing had been contributed to the funds of the Bank. If by assigning the books he made this fraud successful, the amount, of course, is virtually to be paid by the honest depositors. It is certain that Harrison, in his own name, could recover nothing at all in a suit against the Bank, for he contributed nothing to its deposits. We think he should not be allowed by assigning his book to convert nothing into something, but that the nature and purpose of savings banks, and the relation of depositors to each other, as well as their mutual security, all require the application of the principle that no depositor can convey to another any greater right in the funds of the Bank than he has himself, and that any defense on the part of the Bank which is good against the original depositor is equally good against his assignee, unless there are facts to create an estoppel. The argument in behalf of the plaintiff, founded upon an assumed analogy between certificates of deposit issued by commercial banks and the pass-books issued by savings banks, is fallacious, for there is no such analogy. The two kinds of banks are created for widely different purposes. The former must have a capital of their own, and the purpose for which they exist is to facilitate commercial transactions over a wide territory; while the latter have no capital, and hold no relations to commerce, are neither adapted nor designed to aid commercial transactions, have a local and limited field for their operations, and hold no relation to any persons except their depositors, and those to whom the depositors' money has been loaned. The purpose of the certificate issued by a commercial bank is to enable the person receiving it to obtain credit in the public markets, and to carry his funds safely to remote places. On the other hand, the savings bank pass-book is not issued with any design to induce third persons to give credit to the holder, but its sole purpose is to put in a shape convenient for the depositor and the bank a statement of the accounts between them; and the order about which so much was said in argument is, in contemplation of the law, the mere appointment of some person as agent for the depositor to receive the money. In Eaves v. People's Sav. Bank, supra, it is well termed "a power of attorney." By this we do not, of course, intend to have it implied that the depositor cannot sell his right to the money. Like any other non-negotiable chose in action, it may be sold, subject to the equities and defenses between the original parties. But the plaintiff further contends that the book, with or without the order, was made negotiable by contract. We are not quite sure that we apprehend the force of this point as it lay in the mind of counsel. There was no transaction with anyone but Harrison, and by reason of his fraud that was no contract at all; and besides, as it is for the law to declare the negotiability of instruments, we do not see how the mere contract of the parties can be effectual to this end. In further confirmation of the result we have reached that the savings bank pass-book is not negotiable, we refer to the following well-considered cases: Com. v. Reading Sav. Bank, 133 Mass. 16; Smith v. Brooklyn Sav. Bank, 101 N. Y. 58, 1 Cent. Rep. 801; Witte v. Vincenot, 48 Cal. 825.

In Witte v. Vincenot it was held that "the pass-book of a savings bank was an account kept between the bank and the depositor, . . . showing the business transactions of the parties with each other. . . . It is not of itself a negotiable instrument, nor could any mere agreement of the parties to it have the effect to invest it with that character in a commercial sense. In this respect the account shown in the pass-book is not to be distinguished from the account of a merchant or tradesman kept with his customer in the same way, nor would the agreement of the parties to such account, that the account itself might be transferred to order, have any more effect upon the rights and remedies of any third party in the one case than in the other. . . . That a negotiable instrument may be transferred to order is clear; but it does not follow that every instrument which may be transferred to order is thereby necessarily become a negotiable instrument. A collateral agreement between the parties that an instrument in writing, not negotiable, might be transferred by the holder to order, would not alter the character of the instrument itself."

2. We come now to the question whether, upon the facts that appear in the finding, the defendant is estopped from showing that the sum appearing on the book to the credit of Harrison was in fact never deposited. The precise claim of the plaintiff under this head is that the defendant was estopped by its negligence, which impliedly concedes that this is the one controlling fact to create the estoppel. But negligence on the part of the defendant is a fact not found by the court, and without such a finding there is no foundation at all for the plaintiff's claim. There was no specific duty resting upon the Bank which, being omitted, constituted negligence as matter of law. There are doubtless facts and circumstances which as evidence would tend to show negligence, but they failed to convince the trial court of the fact, and so they amount to nothing for the purposes of this review. This alone defeats the claim of estoppel; but there are other essential elements wholly wanting. The only representation on the part of the defendant was the entry contained in the pass-book, which was not made with knowledge of the material facts on the part of the defendant; nor was the party to whom it was made ignorant of the truth. The pass-book was obtained from the Bank by gross fraud, and therefore it was not in law issued by the defendant Bank. And where representations have been procured by fraud, except under very peculiar circumstances,—such, for instance, as representations directly affecting the currency of negotiable paper,—there will be no estoppel upon the party making them, though made with the full intention that they should be acted upon. But here there was no such intention. Bigelow, Estoppel, 2d ed. 450; Wilcox v. Howell, 44 N. Y. 398; Holden v. Putnam F. Ins. Co. 46 N. Y. 1; Calhoun v. Richardson, 30 Conn. 210; Sinnett v. Moles, 38 Iowa, 25. Then, in addition to all these insuperable objections to the plaintiff's claim, we have the fact that the plaintiff himself was guilty of negligence, and is not a bona fide holder of the pass-book.

3. But here the plaintiff claims that the court erred in finding that the plaintiff was not a bona fide holder of the pass-book. The fact was distinctly alleged in the complaint that he was a bona fide holder, and denied in the answer, presenting a distinct issue of fact, which the court upon all the evidence found adversely to the plaintiff. We think the finding is conclusive on this point.

There was no error in the judgment complained of.

The other Judges concurred.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

HORNTALL & Brother

v.

D. S. BURWELL et al., Appls.

(..... N. C.)

1. A mortgagor's removal of personal property to another State, where it is seized and sold by his creditors on attachment, cannot affect the rights of the mortgagee whose mortgage was duly recorded in the State where the parties resided.

2. A judgment on attachment against a debtor who has brought mortgaged personally into the State is not binding on the mortgagee who is not a party, and whose mortgage is duly recorded in another State where the parties reside.

(October 20, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Washington County overruling a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought by the mortgagees of certain NOTE.—Lien of chattel mortgage; removal of property to another State.

If a mortgage on chattels is invalid when made, all of the requirements of the law having been complied with, and if the property is thereafter removed by the mortgagor into another State, the lien of the mortgage will not thereby be lost, but it may be enforced in the State where the property is found. If the mortgage lien is invalid when made, because of a failure to comply with the regulations prescribed by the State in which the property is then located, it will continue invalid after the removal of the property to another State. Thomas, Chat. Mort. §§ 320, 321.

In New York State it is held that where a contract in regard to personal property is made in another State, the law of such State as to its validity and effect is to govern here, and if valid there it is to be considered equally valid, and can be enforced here. Etna Ins. Co. v. Aldrich, 26 N. Y. 98. So, also, where a lien is valid in this State, and the property is temporarily removed to another State, 13 L. R. A.

a creditor cannot defeat the interest acquired under the same, by proceedings in invitum in another State. Martin v. Hill, 12 Barb. 631.

The rule last stated is also recognized by the decisions in other States. Langworthy v. Little, 12 Cush. 109; Jones v. Taylor, 30 Vt. 42; Ferguson v. Clifford, 37 N. H. 86.

The principle is well settled that a voluntary conveyance of personal property, good by the law of the place where it was made, passes title where-soever the property may be situated. Hoyt v. Thompson, 19 N. Y. 224.

The true rule is laid down in Edgerly v. Bush, 81 N. Y. 203, by Folger, Ch. J., as follows: "The law of the domicile of the owner of personal property, as a general rule, determines the validity of every transfer made of it by him."

A mortgage valid in Connecticut, where the property was, and where the parties entered into the mortgage contract, protects the mortgagee in his right to any property covered thereby that may have been subsequently brought into the State of personal property which had been removed from the State and sold under execution against the mortgagor, to recover its value from the purchaser at the execution sale. Affirmed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Mr. B. B. Winborne for appellants.

Messrs. C. L. Pettigrew and Pruden & Vann for appellees.

Shepherd, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principle embodied in the maxim mobilia sequuntur personam is generally recognized in all civilized countries, and it follows as a natural consequence, says Story (Conf. L. 383), that "the laws of the owner's domicile (or the lex loci contractus) should in all cases determine the validity of every transfer, alienation, or disposition made by the owner, whether it be inter vivos or be post mortem." The authority of such laws, however, is admitted in other States, not ex proprio vigore, but ex comitate, and hence it is now very generally held that when they "clash with and interfere with the rights of the citizens of the countries where the parties to the contract seek to enforce it, as one or the other of them must give way, those prevailing where the relief is sought must have the preference." Olivier v. Townes, 2 Mart. N. S. 93; 2 Kent, Com. 458; Moye v. May, 43 N. C. 131.

This is illustrated by the leading case first cited, where a ship sold in Virginia was before delivery attached by creditors at New Orleans. The court held the sale void as to the attaching creditors, because the law of the situs required an actual delivery to pass the title. So, in the case of Green v. Van Buskirk, 74 U. S. 7 Wall. 139, 19 L. ed. 109, an attachment in Illinois was sustained as against the mortgage executed by the owner in New York, but not registered in Illinois, where the property was situated. The laws of that State provided that the mortgage should be "void as against third persons unless acknowledged and registered, and unless the property be delivered to and remain with the mortgagee." This principle, however, has no application to a case like ours, where the mortgage was executed and duly registered according to both the law of the domicile and the law of the situs. The property was situated in this State, and the title of the mortgagees perfected here. This being so, we think it quite clear that the removal of the property to another State could not deprive the mortgagees of their rights. In support of this position there seems to be a consensus of judicial opinion. Even in Louisiana (whose courts were, perhaps, among the most prominent in giving effect to the law of the situs, as above explained) there has never been any doubt upon this question. On the contrary, in Thuret v. Jenkins, 7 Mart. (La.) 318, it was held that, where the title had passed, "the circumstance of the chattel being afterwards brought into a country, according to the laws of which the sale would be invalid, would not affect it." The doctrine of this case has since been affirmed in Southern Bank v. Wood, 14 La. Ann. 564. To the same effect is Langworthy v. Little, 12 Cush. 109, where Shaw, Ch. J., says that "a party who obtains a good title to property, absolute, or qualified by the laws of a sister State, is entitled to maintain and enforce those rights in this State." The property was attached in Massachusetts as the property of the mortgagor, and the sheriff was held liable for its conversion. So in Jones, Chat. Mort., 301, it is said that, "although the mortgage be not executed in conformity with the laws of the State to which the property is afterwards removed, if executed and recorded according to the laws of the State or country of its execution, it is effectual to hold the property in the State to which it is removed." So in Ballard v. Winter, 30 Conn. 17, the Supreme Court of Connecticut sustained an action of trover against one of its own citizens for suing out attachment proceedings against property which had been mortgaged according to the law of Massachusetts, but which had been subsequently removed to the former State. The court said: "By the general rules of law, title thus perfected in one State is respected in all other States and countries into which the property may come. . . . It would certainly be very inconvenient if such mortgages, fairly made in Massachusetts, should be held invalid in Connecticut in respect to movable property, which may be daily passing to and fro along the dividing lines between the States." This case is re-

New York. Etna Ins. Co. v. Aldrich, 26 N. Y. 96, 97; Hoyt v. Thompson, 19 N. Y. 224; Ferguson v. Clifford, 37 N. H. 80; Martin v. Hill, 12 Barb. 681; Story, Conf. L. § 244; Ockerman v. Cross, 54 N. Y. 32; 2 Kent, Com. *458; Langworthy v. Little, 12 Cush. 109; Edgerly v. Bush, 81 N. Y. 199; Jones v. Taylor, 30 Vt. 42.

It is the general rule in reference to personal property that it has no locality, but follows the person of its owner, and that its disposition and transfer are governed by the law of his domicile, and that a voluntary conveyance, valid by the laws of the place where the owner resides, will operate as a transfer of property wherever situated. Ockerman v. Cross, 54 N. Y. 20.

So, an assignment, valid by the laws of the State where it is executed, cannot be allowed to operate to the disadvantage of creditors residing in another State, so far as property interests of the assignor, situate in the other State, are concerned. Hoyt v. Thompson, 5 N. Y. 320, 349; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 568, 10 L. ed. 297; 2 Kent, Com. 406; 4 Kent, Com. 408, 407; Andrews v. Herriot, 4 Cow. 510; 18 L. R. A.

Gullander v. Howell, 35 N. Y. 657; Fox v. Adams, 5 Me. 245; Johnson v. Parker, 4 Bush. 149; Einer v. Deynoodt, 39 Mo. 69; Story, Conf. L. §§ 7, 244, 326, 327, 383, 384, 390; Hardmann v. Bowen, 39 N. Y. 196; Scott v. Guthrie, 10 Bosw. 408; Julland v. Rathbone, 39 N. Y. 369; Kelley v. Crapo, 45 N. Y. 86, 94, 97; Varnum v. Camp, 13 N. J. L. 326; Ingraham v. Geyer, 13 Mass. 148; Boyd v. Rockport Steam Cotton Mills, 7 Gray, 408; Burr. Assignments, 362, 373; Moore v. Bonnell, 31 N. J. L. 90; Walters v. Whitlock, 9 Fla. 86.

As we have seen, the general rule is, that if the transfer or disposition of personal property is valid at the owner's domicile, where made, it is valid everywhere. This rule has its exceptions, when the laws of different jurisdictions are in conflict and particularly in cases where the situs rei at the time of the contract is in another State. Varnum v. Camp, 13 N. J. L. 326; Moore v. Bonnell, 31 N. J. L. 90; Runyon v. Groshon, 12 N. J. Eq. 87; Bentley v. Whittemore, 19 N. J. Eq. 482; Frazier v. Fredericks, 24 N. J. L. 162. F. S. R.

ported in 12 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 759, and is highly approved by the annotator, who cites several authorities in its support. The same point was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in Bank of United States v. Lee, 38 U. S. 13 Pet. 107, 10 L. ed. 81. There certain property, being in Virginia, was conveyed in trust to Richard Bland Lee, for the benefit of Mrs. Lee. The title passed according to the Virginia law, but, the property being subsequently removed to the District of Columbia, where under a prevailing Maryland statute, such a transfer would not be good except upon certain conditions, which had not been complied with, the court (Catron, J.), said that "the Statute had no reference to a case where the title had been vested by the laws of another State, but operates only on sales, mortgages, and gifts made in Maryland." The following authorities are also directly in point: Hill, Mortg. 412; Keenan v. Stinson, 32 Minn. 377; Ferguson v. Clifford, 37 N. H. 86; Jones v. Taylor, 30 Vt. 42; Rhode Island Cent. Bank v. Danforth, 14 Gray, 123; Martin v. Hill, 12 Barb. 681; Kanaga v. Taylor, 7 Ohio St. 134; Wilson v. Carson, 13 Md. 54; Smith v. McLean, 24 Iowa, 322; Hicks v. Skinner, 71 N. C. 539; Barker v. Stacy, 25 Miss. 477; Feurt v. Rowell, 62 Mo. 524.

The defendants, however, contend that they are protected by the sale under the attachment proceedings in the Virginia court. They rely upon the case of Green v. Van Buskirk, supra, and insist that under the Act of Congress full faith and credit must be given to the judgments of the courts of a sister State. It is true that the decision referred to was chiefly based upon that Statute, but it must be observed that the record of such an adjudication has only (we quote from the opinion) "the same faith and credit as it has in the state court from which it is taken," and that, "in order to give due force and effect to a judicial proceeding, it is often necessary to show by evidence outside of the record the predicament of the property on which it operated." Such was the course pursued by the court in that case; and, as we have seen that the title to the property had not passed according to the law of the situs, the attachment proceedings were sustained. If, however, it had appeared that at the time of the execution of the mortgage in New York the property was also there, but had been afterwards removed to Illinois, it cannot be doubted that the decision would have been otherwise. Happily we have a case directly in point from the Supreme Court of Illinois—Mumford v. Canty, 50 Ill. 370. It is there distinctly held that, "where personal property was mortgaged in the State of Missouri, and permitted to remain with the mortgagor (contrary to the law of Illinois) after the maturity of the debt to secure which the mortgage was given, and, upon being subsequently brought into Illinois, was seized under an attachment in favor of a bona fide creditor of the mortgagor, the rights of the mortgagee [would] be determined by the law of Missouri;" and the mortgagee was permitted to recover the property of the purchaser. Here, then, we have an express decision as to the effect which is to be given to such a judgment in the State in which it is rendered, and it is only to this 18 L. R. A.

extent, and no further, that the judgment is conclusive in a sister State. To hold otherwise would go beyond what the Statute requires, and give the same effect to an attachment proceeding which generally follows a proceeding which is strictly and technically in rem. Such is not the law. An attachment proceeding, though often spoken of as a proceeding in rem, "cannot be admitted to come within the strict meaning of that term; the judgment is conclusive only upon the actual parties to the litigation and those in privity with them. . . . and they use the hold obtained by the seizure of specific property merely as a means of reaching and giving effect to the rights of parties, and neither claim nor exercise any controlling authority over the title of strangers. The same remark applies to replevin." 2 Black, Judgm. § 801; Duchess of Kingston's Case, 3 Smith, Lead. Cas. 9th Am. ed. 2011; Drake, Attachm. 245. In his notes to the latter case, Judge Hare cites with entire approval the opinion of Hall, J., in Woodruff v. Taylor, 20 Vt. 65, in which it is said that the operation of such a proceeding "must be limited to the parties to it, and cannot in any manner affect the right or interest of any other person having an independent and adverse claim to the goods," etc. Having shown, we think, that the title perfected here was not lost by the removal of the property to Virginia, and that the record of the judgment in the attachment proceedings is only to be respected in so far as effect is given to it in that State, we cannot but assume, in the absence of any decision to the contrary, that the same principle of comity so universally recognized and acted upon likewise prevails in Virginia, and that, even if these plaintiffs were suing in that jurisdiction, they would be permitted to recover. This would seem all the more reasonable, as we have extended this very comity to a citizen of our sister State in a case precisely similar to the one under consideration. Anderson v. Doak, 32 N. C. 295. There a slave, being in Virginia, was mortgaged by its owner, and the mortgage duly registered in Carroll County. It was never registered in this State, nor was it executed according to its laws. The slave came to this State, and was attached by a creditor of the mortgagor. In an action of trover, brought by the mortgagee against the sheriff, the plaintiff was permitted to recover. It will be noted that we have discussed this question as if the plaintiff were seeking redress in the courts of Virginia. If we have shown that, according to what appears to be the entire course of judicial opinion, they would be entitled to recover there, a fortiori can they recover in the courts of this State when they have acquired jurisdiction over the parties. To the foregoing authorities we will add a recent decision of the Court of Appeals of New York. In that case (Edgerty v. Bush, 81 N. Y. 199) B. executed to plaintiff a chattel mortgage upon a span of horses. Both parties were then residents of New York. B. subsequently took them to Canada, where they were sold by a regular trader dealing in horses, the purchaser buying in good faith. Under the laws of Canada property cannot be reclaimed from one so purchasing without refunding the price paid. Defendant, a resident of this State, bought the horses in Canada from such purchaser, and they were left in Canada. Upon refusal of defendant to deliver them, the plaintiff sued for their conversion. The court held (Folger, Ch. J., delivering an elaborate opinion) that the plaintiff was entitled to recover. We are of the opinion that his honor very properly overruled the demurrer, but he should have given the defendant an opportunity to answer. Code, § 272; Moore v. Hobbs, 77 N. C. 65; Bronson v. Wilmington N. C. L. Ins. Co. 85 N. C. 411.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

W. B. STULTS, Appt.,

v.

H. H. SALE.

(...Ky....)

Loss of his family will not terminate the legally acquired homestead exemption of one who continues to occupy the premises as a housekeeper, under statutes which were enacted from a spirit of liberality towards the debtor, as evidenced by the continuance of a wife's homestead exemption for the benefit of her husband after her death and other similar provisions.

(September 12, 1891.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff for a judgment of the Louisville Chancery Court in favor of defendant in an action brought to subject certain property to the payment of plaintiff's claim against defendant. Affirmed.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. C. Rucker and C. B. Seymour, for appellant:

One cannot be regarded as a bona fide housekeeper with a family, unless there are those living with him who not only bear a dependent relation to him, but whom he is under a natural or legal obligation to maintain.

Brooks v. Collins, 11 Bush, 625; Carter v. Adams (Ky.) 9 Ky. L. Rep. 91; Riley v. Smith (Ky.) 9 Ky. L. Rep. 616; Ellis v. Davis (Ky.) 11 Ky. L. Rep. 893.

In Kentucky there is a derivative homestead, which does not in any way depend upon the survivor being a housekeeper with a family.

Allensworth v. Kimbrough, 79 Ky. 334; Ellis v. Davis, supra.

But the case at bar is not a case of derivative homestead. The title was not in Mrs. Sale, but in appellee.

The claim that, as Sale once had a homestead exemption and had never abandoned the property, his exemption continued although he has ceased to have a family, cannot be sustained.

Cooper v. Cooper, 24 Ohio St. 488.

The Legislature has enacted a statute and provided to what class of people it shall apply; when a party ceases to belong to that class the Statute becomes inapplicable to him.

It never was the intention of our law that anything should be exempt for the benefit of the debtor. He is under moral as well as legal obligation to pay his debts; but for the benefit of his family exemptions are allowed him.

See M' Murray v. Shuck, 6 Bush, 111; Thorn v. Darlington, 6 Bush, 449.

Messrs. Abbott & Rutledge for appellee.

Holt, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal presents a single, but hitherto undecided, question by this court. When the appellee, H. H. Sale, in 1864, first came into the occupancy of the property in contest, and in which he had a life estate, he was undoubtedly a bona fide housekeeper with a family. It then consisted of a wife and five children; and that he then acquired a homestead right in the property is beyond question. He has occupied it as a housekeeper ever since. In 1863, when this suit was brought upon a return of nulla bona to subject whatever property he had to the payment of the appellant's debt, his family had narrowed to one daughter, an invalid brother, and his mother-in-law; and since October, 1887, although a housekeeper in the property, he has, by reason of death and marriage, had no family whatever, within the legal meaning of that term, living with him. Brooks v. Collins, 11 Bush, 622. It is therefore claimed that it is not now exempt to him as a homestead, but it is liable to the appellant's

NOTE.—Homestead, how far defeated by loss of family.

A man's homestead once acquired is not lost or defeated by the death or absence of his wife and children. Wilkinson v. Merrill (Va.) 11 L. R. A. 632; Kessler v. Draub, 52 Tex. 575; *Taylor v. Or by her abandonment of him. Griffin v. Nichols, 51 Mich. 575.

Even if she is given the custody of the children. Woods v. Davis, 34 Iowa, 264. Contra, Arp v. Jacobs (Wyo.) Oct. 13, 1891.

On removal of the wife and children after a limited divorce the same rule applies and the husband's homestead continues. Doyle v. Coburn, 6 Allen, 71.

debt. Our Statute exempts to the debtor as a homestead land worth not over $1,000, if he be a bona fide housekeeper, with a family, of this Commonwealth. The nature of this right is not fixed by the Statute by name. He may sell the property, but is divested of the right to it if he permanently abandons it as his home. It may, perhaps, be said to be a qualified estate. It continues after his death, for his widow, during her occupancy of it, though there be no children. Gay v. Hanks, 81 Ky. 522.

The husband has the like right in the homestead of the deceased wife. This court has decided that where the right is thus derivative the having of a family is not necessary to its continuance. It is to the creation of the right at the outset in the husband or wife, but not to the continuance of it in the survivor. Ellis v. Davis (Ky.) 11 Ky. L. Rep. 893.

In this case, however, there is no derivative right of homestead. The property belongs to the husband, who is the debtor, and is claiming it as exempt to him as a homestead. Undoubtedly the having of a family was necessary to the creation of the right in him, but is it necessary to the continuance of it? While essential to its coming into existence, yet, when it has once vested in the debtor, does he lose it by death or the marriage of his children, leaving him alone, but still a housekeeper, in the occupancy of the property? The Statute makes no express mention in this respect. We must therefore look to its general scope and spirit for guidance, the right being the creature of it. It is urged with force that the homestead exemption is for the benefit of the family, and, therefore, where this family relation does not exist, there is no homestead exemption. In other words, the reason for the rule ceasing, the rule ceases. This is true as to the coming into existence of the homestead right; and it is no doubt also true that the primary object of the Statute was the protection of families from want, and the giving to them a shelter; yet the fact that the Statute gives the homestead of the deceased wife to the husband during his occupancy of it, although he has no family, shows that it was not intended to provide for the wife and children alone. He, in such a case does not become homeless. Can it well be supposed that the Legislature intended that, in the event of the death of the wife, owning the homestead, the benefit of it should continue to the husband during his occupancy, although he has no family, and yet that if he be the owner of it, and his wife and children die, or the latter marry and leave him, his right to the exemption ceases? If so, it is a singular state of case; and, if so, it is equally true of the wife, where she owns the homestead. In the event of the husband's death owning the homestead, she takes it as survivor, so long as she occupies it, although she has no family; but if she owns it, and her husband dies, there being no longer any family, her homestead right ceases. Why should not the original owner have a right equal to the survivor, and why should not the law favor the latter equally at least with the former? Is the party to be worsted because he owns the property? Can any reason be given why the same right should not exist as to his own property as is given to him in his wife's property after her death? Ought not his claim to a homestead in his own property, as against his own creditors, to be as much regarded as his claim to one in her property after her death? The construction here contended for by the creditor should not be given to a statute which was enacted from a spirit of liberality towards the debtor. The Massachusetts Statute of 1855 limited the homestead exemption to a "householder having a family." It continued it to the widow and children after his death, but contained no provision for its continuance to the husband after the death of his wife, and the departure of his children; but the supreme court of that State held that his right was not thereby lost, so long as he continued to occupy the property as his home, saying: "Any other construction would render a husband who had been deprived of his family by accident or disease, or by their desertion, without any fault of his, liable to be instantly turned out of his homestead by his creditors." Silvovay v. Brown, 12 Allen, 30.

This case, and other somewhat kindred ones, are cited in section 72 of Thompson on Homesteads with apparent approval; and, while the Massachusetts Statute, as well as that of Illinois, denominates the right as "an estate of homestead," while our own merely exempts land worth $1,000 as a homestead, yet the case last cited, as well as Kimbrel v. Willis, 97 Ill. 494, and Kessler v. Draub, 52 Tex. 575, are so far kindred to this one as to merit citation. True, the question is one of statutory construction, and the decisions in other States are of value only so far as their statutes are like our own; but, considering the entire Act, and the spirit which led to its enactment, it seems to us its only reasonable construction is that, while the having of a family is necessary to the creation of the homestead right, this is not necessary to its continuance. It is not necessary to inquire why this was made a necessary condition to its creation. The Statute in substance says so, but it does not provide that it is necessary to its continuance, and, in order to harmonize and render consistent and reasonable its other provisions, it should not, in our opinion, be so construed. Here the debtor was invested with the right. It existed when this suit was brought. He has done nothing to release or forfeit it; and, in our opinion, is still entitled to it, being yet a housekeeper in the property, although by misfortune he no longer has a family.

Judgment affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS

Warren BRYANT et al., Exrs., etc., of Francis W. Tracy, Deceased, Appts.,
v.

Harriet F. Tracy THOMPSON, Impleaded, etc., Resp't.

(.....N. Y.)

The right to appeal as a party "aggrieved" does not extend to executors who have obtained a judgment construing a will as to which of two parties is entitled to a certain bequest where the alleged claimants acquiesce in the decision.

(Ruger, Ch. J., and Andrews and Gray, JJ., dissent.)

(October 13, 1891.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Fifth Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for Erie County construing the will of Francis W. Tracy, deceased, and holding that defendant, Mrs. Thompson, was entitled to a benefit thereunder. Dismissed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John G. Milburn, for appellant:

The plaintiffs have the right to bring this appeal.

Bryant v. Thompson, 36 N. Y. S. R. 921.

The executors of a will have the right to bring an action of this nature. As to the personal property the executors are trustees, and only personal property is involved in this action.

Bowers v. Smith, 10 Paige, 193, 4 L. ed. 940; Wager v. Wager, 89 N. Y. 161; Bailey v. Briggs, 56 N. Y. 413; Chipman v. Montgomery, 63 N. Y. 231; Dill v. Wiener, 88 N. Y. 160.

The executors are "parties aggrieved" within the meaning of section 1294 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Messrs. John E. Parsons and Charles Robinson Smith, with Mr. H. B. Closson, for respondent:

The expression "party aggrieved," used in the Statute, does not necessarily and in all cases mean a party who has a direct pecuniary interest in the question, in the sense that if one construction of the will be adopted, he gets a bequest, and if another, he does not.

People v. Jones, 110 N. Y. 509; Bockes v. Hathorn, 78 N. Y. 222; 2 Perry, Trusts, § 928.

Only parties aggrieved can appeal.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1294; Banta v. Kent, 4 N. Y. Week. Dig. 62; Reid v. Vanderheyden, 5 Cow. 719; Steele v. White, 2 Paige, 478, 2 L. ed. 995; Colden v. Bots, 12 Wend. 234; 2 Rumsey, Practice, 640; Kellogg v. Israel, 11 Paige, 147, 5 L. ed. 88; Card v. Bird, 10 Paige, 426, 4 L. ed. 1038; Hyatt v. Dusenbury, 8 Cent. Rep. 78, 106 N. Y. 663; Ross v. Wigg, 1 Cent. Rep. 292, 100 N. Y. 243; Bush v. Rochester City Bank, 48 N. Y. 659; Hall v. Brooks, 89 N. Y. 33; Hoag v. Hatch, 24 N. Y. S. R. 91.

The word "aggrieved," in the Statute, refers to a substantial grievance,—a denial to the party of some claim of right either of property or of person or the imposition upon him of some burden or obligation.

It is not the province of courts to decide abstract questions of law disconnected from the granting of actual relief.

Grove v. Garlock, 29 Hun, 598; People v. Troy, 82 N. Y. 575.

The plaintiffs brought this action for a construction of certain clauses in the will which affect only the two defendants, and they asked the instructions of the court.

They have obtained this relief, and received their instructions. Neither defendant complains. The plaintiffs are therefore not aggrieved.

Atkinson v. Manks, 1 Cow. 691.

NOTE.—Right of administrator, executor, or trustee to appeal as party aggrieved from a decision as to rights of distributees or beneficiaries inter sese.

The main case is in accordance with the weight of authority, which holds that executors, administrators and trustees are not aggrieved by a decision as to the rights of the beneficiaries among themselves. Goldtree v. Thompson, 83 Cal. 420; Merrifield v. Longmire, 86 Cal. 190; Wright's Estate, 49 Cal. 550; Bates v. Ryberg, 40 Cal. 465; Re Dewar's Estate, 10 Mont. 422.

An executor cannot appeal as such from a decree of settlement and distribution, although he is a legatee. Re Marrey's Estate, 65 Cal. 287.

And a trustee in insolvency cannot appeal from the allowance of a claim where the creditors interested acquiesce in the decision. Salmon v. Pierson, 8 Md. 297, distinguishing Ellicott v. Ellicott, 6 Gill & J. 35, where a trustee in chancery was allowed to appeal from a decree of distribution on the ground that in that case he was personally interested. But see Marrey's Estate, supra.

And a trustee to sell mortgaged property cannot appeal from an order directing the payment of a claim against the fund. Stewart v. Codd, 58 Md. 86.

By an application of the same principle an administrator is not entitled to file cross-interrogatories in a proceeding to determine who are the 13 L. R. A.

distributees and their rights as to each other. Roach v. Coffey, 73 Cal. 281.

An executor cannot appeal from the refusal to allow a claim of a creditor which he has not paid or become liable to pay. Kellett v. Rathbun, 4 Paige, 104, 3 L. ed. 362.

On the other hand, it has been held that a trustee is aggrieved by a decision denying a valid claim on the fund because he is a trustee for all the claimants. Bockes v. Hathorn, 78 N. Y. 222.

And in exact conflict with the principle laid down by the cases first cited above is a decision that it is the duty of an administrator to appeal if he has reasonable ground to believe there is error in a judgment and order of distribution. In this case the alleged error was in holding that conveyances to the intestate's sons were advancements and as the debts had all been paid only the distributees were interested. Ruch v. Biery, 9 West. Rep. 215, 110 Ind. 444.

In line with this is another decision that an administrator may appeal from an order of payment on the ground that it lays down a rule of apportionment which works injustice as between creditors of the estate. Re McCune's Estate, 76 Mo. 203.

An executor may appeal from an order setting aside a sale which he has made as authorized and required by the will. Re Bagger's Estate, 78 Iowa, 171.

B. A. R.

The right to appeal is limited to the extent of the grievance.

Hone v. Van Schaick, 7 Paige, 222, 3 L. ed. 132; Cuyler v. Moreland, 6 Paige, 273, 3 L. ed. 983; Idley v. Bowen, 11 Wend. 227; Card v. Bird, 10 Paige, 426, 4 L. ed. 1038; Reid v. Vanderheyden, 5 Cow. 719.

This is like a bill of interpleader, the plaintiffs being stakeholders and the defendants being the two claimants.

In such an action the plaintiff has no interest except to be rid of the thing, debt, or duty which the two defendants both claim. All that is material to him is a determination that the bill of interpleader has been properly filed.

Dorn v. Fox, 61 N. Y. 264; Atkinson v. Manks, 1 Cow. 691; 11 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, pp. 494, 504, note 1; Coyne v. Armstrong, 77 Ill. 139; Badeau v. Rogers, 2 Paige, 209, 2 L. ed. 878.

An executor cannot appeal in behalf of one set of legatees or creditors as against another, where all are before the court.

Kellett v. Rathbun, 4 Paige, 102, 3 L. ed. 361; Bates v. Ryberg, 40 Cal. 463; Wright's Estate, 49 Cal. 550.

A trustee cannot appeal in behalf of one beneficiary as against others where all are before the court.

Salmon v. Pierson, 8 Md. 299; Stewart v. Codd, 58 Md. 86; Bockes v. Hathorn, 78 N. Y. 222; Hall v. Brooks, 89 N. Y. 33.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs, as executors and trustees of the will of Francis W. Tracy, who died April 15, 1886, brought this action in order to procure a judicial construction of its provisions. The will and codicils dispose of a large estate, consisting of both real and personal property. Numerous large bequests were made to collateral relatives, and also to various public and private charitable institutions. The residuary estate was left to the widow. The only clause of the will with which we are concerned, in the decision of this appeal, is the one in which provision was made for the defendant Harriet F. Tracy, who is the only child and heir-at-law of the testator. At the time of his death she was an infant, nearly nineteen years of age, and since the commencement of this action, and about the month of April, 1890, she married one George Thompson. She is the daughter of a former wife, who obtained a divorce from the testator many years before his death. When very young, she and her mother separated from the testator, and took up their residence in the City of New York, while the deceased continued to reside in Buffalo, where he died. The relations between the deceased and his daughter and her maternal relatives had for many years been hostile. Her mother's maiden name was Robinson, and the child took that name, and is so designated in some parts of the case. The testator, by a codicil to his will bearing date August 19, 1879, provided a trust fund of $100,000, the income of which was to be paid to his daughter during her life, the principal to be divided among her issue at her death. The form of the bequest was to the executors of his will in trust. The same codicil contained, however, the following provision:

"In case any beneficiary named in my said last will and testament, whether a devisee, legatee, or cestui que trust therein named, shall, in person or by another, contest the probate of my said last will and testament or any codicil thereto, or shall institute any proceedings of any kind with a view to avoid or annul my said last will and testament or any codicil thereto, or any provision in my said last will and testament or in any such codicil contained, then and in either case I do hereby revoke all provisions in my said last will and testament or in any codicil thereto contained in favor of the person or corporation contesting or seeking to avoid such last will and testament or codicil or provision. And if such contestant shall be my daughter, then I give, devise, and bequeath to my wife all the property which in and by such last will and testament and the codicils thereto is or shall be given to my executors in trust for my said daughter's benefit. If my wife shall be such contestant, then I give, devise, and bequeath to my executrix and executors all the property which is by my said last will and testament or any codicil thereto given to my wife, in trust for my daughter, upon the same trusts in every particular as are specified in the second article of this codicil." It seems that the testator contracted a second marriage, and the wife referred to in the provisions of the will, and who took the residuary estate, and with whom he lived up to the time of his death, is the wife of this marriage.

A few days after the death of the testator, his will, with the codicils, were presented to the surrogate of Erie County for probate, by the plaintiffs, and a citation was issued and served upon the daughter, the defendant in this action. Upon the return day of the citation the surrogate, of his own motion, appointed a special guardian for the daughter for the sole purpose of appearing and protecting her interest in the proceedings to prove the will. Subsequently, and after consultation with the defendant and her relatives in New York, and with counsel there, acting for them, the guardian interposed an answer before the surrogate, taking issue in the usual form with the allegations of the petition. The special guardian also retained counsel, and under the direction of the surrogate the proponents of the will were required to produce many witnesses before him for examination, and the trial continued during a number of days. It was contended in behalf of the special guardian that the testator did not possess testamentary capacity; and various witnesses, including servants of the deceased and also experts, were called to sustain that contention. The guardian, through his counsel, requested the surrogate to refuse probate to the will. In the month of November, 1886, the surrogate entered a decree admitting the will to probate, which among other things, contained this clause: "Pursuant to section 2623 of the Code of Civil Procedure, it is hereby stated that the probate of said will was contested." The daughter herself was present at the hearing, and was called and heard as a witness on behalf of the special guardian. After the entry of the decree admitting the will to probate, the widow executed, acknowledged, and filed with the surrogate a paper, under seal, which recited that she was the residuary legatee and devisee of her late husband's will, which had been admitted to probate. The provision of the decree stating that it was contested, and of the will and codicil that the legacy, in case of such contest should be deemed revoked, were referred to. It then recited that she was desirous that all the provisions of her husband's will, respecting his daughter, should be observed, providing his reputation and capacity be not further questioned. It then stipulated that the executors (of whom she was one) shall not claim in any way that the right of the daughter to the provisions of the will for her benefit had been forfeited; that no effect should be given to the clause revoking the legacy in case of a contest by the legatee, but that the legacy should be deemed legal and valid, and the trust in favor of the daughter executed. The consideration for this agreement on the part of the widow was stated to be the omission of the daughter to appeal from the decree of the surrogate, and it was in terms conditioned that no such appeal should be taken, and that no action or proceeding of any nature should be brought by or in behalf of the daughter, or by any person claiming through or under her, to set aside the probate, or question the validity of the will or the testamentary capacity of her husband; and in case such appeal, action or proceeding should be brought or instituted, then the stipulation and agreement should be void and of no effect. The special guardian, however, appealed from the decree of the surrogate to the general term, where the decree was affirmed.

Two of the executors then brought this action to procure the judgment of the court as to the disposition of the $100,000 which the daughter was to take by the provisions of the will. The widow declining to become a party plaintiff, was made a defendant, both individually and as executrix and trustee under the will. The daughter is the only other defendant, and no other question is raised by the pleadings. The complaint, after alleging the making of the will, its provisions, the death of the testator and the proceedings before the surrogate, stated that the daughter still claimed the legacy, but that the plaintiffs were advised that by reason of the clause above quoted, and the contest, the provisions of the clause revoking the gift upon certain contingencies became operative, and that the widow was entitled to the same. The relief asked was that the court give construction to the clauses of the will touching this legacy, and the fund mentioned therein, and that it determine the conflicting claims thereto, and define the rights and duties of the plaintiff concerning the same. The special term held that the contest before the surrogate, by and in the name of the special guardian, was not a contest by the daughter, in person or by another, within the meaning of the clause in the codicil expressing the conditions upon which the legacy should vest, and that she was entitled to the bequest. The general term affirmed the judgment, but upon the ground that, the daughter being an infant, and having merely submitted her rights to the court, the revoking clause was, as to her, an attempt to subvert the course of judicial proceedings, and to deprive the court of the right and duty imposed upon it by law, in all cases, to institute of its own motion proper proceedings for the protection of infants, and that as to the daughter the condition was void as against public policy. It held that the contest must be deemed to have been made by the daughter, although the actual steps were taken by the guardian. Bryant v. Thompson, 87 N. Y. S. R. 431.

The widow allowed the judgment to pass without any answer or other opposition, and the only parties who have appealed to this court are the two executors who brought the action. The argument of the case was accompanied by a motion in this court to dismiss the appeal. The question is therefore raised whether the plaintiffs have such a standing in the case as enables them to bring the appeal. The plaintiffs clearly had the right to bring this action in order to procure a judicial determination of the question as to which of two claimants was entitled to the fund, and also to obtain the instructions of the court in regard to their duties under the will. They have obtained these instructions and this determination from the highest court of the State possessing original and general jurisdiction. There were two parties who had a pecuniary interest in the decision of the question involved in the case,—the daughter, who is satisfied with the result, as it is in her favor, and the widow, who does not appeal. The judgment rendered in the court to which the plaintiffs resorted in the first instance is a perfect protection to them in the disposition of the fund in accordance therewith, and in the performance of every duty growing out of the legacy to the daughter under the provisions of the will. This being true, what interest have the plaintiffs in the further prosecution of the action? They had an interest, and it was their duty, to procure a judicial determination of the questions presented by the facts alleged, but no interest or duty in obtaining a decision according to some view of the law that they may have themselves entertained, or have been advised by counsel. Appeals are not allowed to this court for the purpose of settling abstract questions, however interesting or important they may be to the general public or to the legal profession, but to correct errors injuriously affecting the rights of some party to the litigation. The plaintiffs are not concerned in the slightest degree in any legal sense, with the question whether the provision for the daughter be held for her or deemed revoked, under the other clause, and secured to the widow. The widow is not here complaining of the result in the courts below. Had she waived in writing, or in any other way binding upon her, the conditions of her stipulation touching the contest before the surrogate, after the general term had passed upon the question, it would amount to a settlement of the controversy between the only parties having a pecuniary interest in it which would prevent an appeal. Looking at the substance of things, and keeping in mind the relations which these two beneficiaries now hold to the case, we cannot see that the present appeal stands on grounds any different from what it would then. The widow, after the appeal to the general term from the decree of the surrogate, could have waived the conditions contained in her stipulation in regard to the effect of an appeal, as she had before renounced the benefits of the clause revoking the legacy in case of the contest. She did not, it is true, waive these conditions expressly, but she failed when made a party to this action, to insist upon them; and it is not perceived that the plaintiffs have any interest in insisting, through an appeal to this court, upon a point which the real and only beneficiary has refused to raise for herself. The widow, as already observed, conditionally renounced the benefits of the revoking clause by her deed; and no one, we think, should be permitted to urge that this deed has become inoperative by reason of a breach of its conditions except herself, and that position she is not, it seems, inclined to take.

The plaintiffs are not seeking any benefit for themselves in the action. They have simply asked the judgment and advice of the court in regard to the disposition of property belonging to others, which is in their care and keeping. The court has given the judgment and advice prayed for, and the real beneficiaries do not complain. Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to be heard further in this court does not depend upon any inherent right which the plaintiffs, as suitors, have, but upon express statutory permission. State v. Kings County, 125 N. Y. 312.

The right of a party to have all disputes in which he has any interest determined according to judicial forms in a court possessing original jurisdiction is absolute, if indeed there are any such rights, in a strict sense. But, when he seeks to have the judgment reviewed in this court, he must be able to point to some statute giving him the right and conferring the jurisdiction. The only statute relied upon as securing to the plaintiff in this case the right to appeal is section 1294 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and under that section the right is limited to a party aggrieved. In this case the executors and trustees under a will, having asked the court for directions in regard to their duty and for a judgment as to which of two parties is entitled to a certain bequest, which directions and judgment are given and acquiesced in by both of the alleged claimants of the fund, the plaintiffs are not aggrieved, within the meaning of the Statute, by the judgment rendered. The question decided in the courts below and presented by the record is undoubtedly one of great interest and importance, and for that reason should not be passed upon by this court until brought here by some party having an actual and practical, as distinguished from a mere theoretical, interest in the controversy. Cases can be and are cited by the learned counsel for the appellants in which this court has entertained appeals by executors and trustees under wills from judgments of this character. But it is believed that they are cases either in which the point was not raised at all, or, if raised, the appeal was not only by the trustees, as in this case, but by the beneficiaries, also, so that a motion to dismiss, as now before us in this case, if granted, would not dispose of the case, but would still leave the same questions to be determined upon the appeal of the other parties. If in this case the widow had contested the right of the daughter to receive the legacy, and claimed it for herself, under the clause providing for revocation, and had appealed to this court to maintain that position, and the appeal was before us, we would not then regard this motion as of much practical importance. This was the situation when the court was asked to dismiss the appeal in most if not all the cases of a similar character to which our attention has been directed. An appeal to this court does not lie unless the party appealing has an interest in the controversy. People v. Lawrence, 107 N. Y. 607, 10 Cent. Rep. 720; Hytt v. Dusenbury, 106 N. Y. 663, 8 Cent. Rep. 78.

The case of People v. Jones, 110 N. Y. 509, is not contrary to these views. In that case the commissioners of the land office, representing the State, made a grant of land under water to an individual. Subsequently the determination of the commissioners in making the grant was reversed by the supreme court on certiorari, and the commissioners appealed to this court, where a motion to dismiss was denied. The order appealed from in that case in effect nullified the grant made by the State and the commissioners, as public officers representing the State, were in duty bound to defend the grant against the effect of an erroneous decision, and so were aggrieved.

We think that the plaintiffs have no interest in the question presented by the record in this case, and that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs to both parties payable out of the estate.

A law changing the mode of procedure from indictment to information in cases of offenses already committed, is not ex post facto, and does not infringe any substantial right of the offenders.

(June 11, 1891.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to obtain the release of petitioner from the 13 L. R. A.

custody of the sheriff of Laramie County. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

MENARS, Donzelmann & Van Orsdel, for petitioner:

It is a vested right, belonging to the petitioner, to have his case presented to a grand jury, and he cannot be deprived of such vested right by legislation subsequent to the date of the commission of the alleged crime.

Bill of Rights, § 85, Wyoming Const. art. 1; Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 228-235, 27 L. ed. 506, 508-511; McCarthy v. State, 1

Wash. 377; Re Durbon, 10 Mont. 147; People v. Tisdale, 57 Cal. 104.

A petition for a writ of habeas corpus is the proper remedy and mode of procedure when it draws in question the jurisdiction of the court under whose sentence the petitioner is deprived of his liberty.

People v. Neilson, 16 Hun. 214; Re Eldred, 46 Wis. 580; Ex parte Farnham, 3 Colo. 545.

Mr. Charles N. Potter, Atty-Gen., for the State.

Groesbeck, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a hearing upon the demurrer to the answer and return of A. D. Kelley, sheriff of Laramie County, to the petition for the writ of habeas corpus, and to the writ. It is admitted that the demurrer raises all the questions involved, and that the decision upon it will dispose of the entire case. The answer and return of the sheriff show that the petitioner, Leonard Wright, is restrained of his liberty by the said sheriff in the jail of said Laramie County, under a sentence of the district court of said county, for the term of two years and six months, under his plea of guilty of an assault with an attempt to commit rape. The defendant was informed against by the county and prosecuting attorney of said county for the crime of rape, under the provisions of the law passed by the first Legislature of the State of Wyoming, approved January 10, 1891, entitled "An Act to Change and Regulate the Grand Jury System by Reducing the Number of Grand Jurors, Providing that a Grand Jury shall be Summoned only when Ordered by the Court, and Providing for the Prosecution by Information, and the Procedure thereunder." Sess. Laws Wyo. 1890-91, chap. 59, p. 213.

The offense is charged in the information as having occurred on the 16th day of December, A. D. 1890, nearly a month before the Act took effect; and the counsel for the petitioner claim that the petitioner, notwithstanding his plea of guilty, should be proceeded against by indictment instead of by information, as, prior to the passage of the Act above named, he could only have been accused by indictment. It is urged that the petitioner is held without due process of law, and that the law applying to the prosecution of offenses committed prior to its enactment is an ex post facto law, and in violation of section 35 of the Declaration of Rights (Const. Wyo. art. 1), which states that "no ex post facto law, nor any law impairing the obligation of contracts, shall ever be made." The constitutional authority for the enactment of the Statute is found in said article, and reads as follows: "Sec. 9. The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate in criminal cases, but a jury in civil cases in all courts, or in criminal cases in courts not of record, may consist of less than twelve men, as may be prescribed by law. Hereafter a grand jury may consist of twelve men, any nine of whom concurring may find an indictment, but the Legislature may change, regulate, or abolish the grand-jury system." "Sec. 13. Until otherwise provided by law, no person shall, for a felony, be proceeded against criminally, otherwise than by an indictment, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger."

The Act providing for prosecutions by informations, and under which the petitioner was accused, provides, among other things, that all crimes, misdemeanors, and offenses may be prosecuted in the court having jurisdiction thereof, either by indictment, as "hereinafter provided," or by information. It further provides that "no grand jury shall hereafter be summoned or required to attend at the sittings of any district court in this State, unless the same shall be ordered by a district court, or by the judge thereof, in the vacation or recess of said court, and the grand jury shall consist of twelve men, nine of whom must concur in the finding of an indictment." The Act was undoubtedly intended to apply to prosecutions of all offenses committed prior to the passage of the Act as well as to those committed thereafter. There is no repeal of existing laws, nor any saving clause providing that offenses committed prior to the passage of the Act shall be inquired of, prosecuted, and punished under laws existing at the time of the passage of the Act. It seems that the Legislature had determined to dispense with grand juries after the Act took effect, except when called by the court or judge thereof, following very closely the law of Michigan in this respect. The general right to substitute prosecutions by information in place of prosecutions by indictment is conceded, in view of the constitutional provisions in this State, and it is not claimed that this infringes any right of a defendant. Indeed, this has been so frequently settled that it is unnecessary to cite any authorities, but we cite a few, which have come immediately under our observation. Hurtado v. California, 110 U. S. 516, 28 L. ed. 232; Re Lowrie, 8 Colo. 499; State v. Barnett, 3 Kan. 250; Rouan v. State, 30 Wis. 129.

These cases dispose also of the question as to whether or not a proceeding by information is due process of law, and we do not consider it necessary to dwell longer on this point. We reach the vital question, which it is practically admitted is the only one before us, whether or not the petitioner has a right to complain now, after his plea of guilty has been entered, that he was not indicted by a grand jury. Notwithstanding the somewhat singular case presented to us, of a defendant, represented in every stage of the case by eminent counsel, waiting until he has withdrawn his plea of not guilty, after he has interposed his plea of guilty, after he has had ample time to raise all objections to the validity of the proceedings, now asking this court to release him from imprisonment under what he claims is a void sentence, we shall proceed to determine the question whether or not the District Court for Laramie County acquired jurisdiction of the case by the information filed therein, or whether the petitioner had a right to be indicted by the grand jury of said county.

The rules laid down for the determination of the question as to whether or not a law is ex post facto are found in the case of Caldwell v. Bull, 3 U. S. 3 Dall. 386, 1 L. ed. 648, and have been very generally adopted by the courts of this country. They define the following laws as ex post facto: (1) every law that makes an action done before the passing of the law, and which was innocent when done, criminal, and punishes such action; (2) every law that aggravates a crime or makes it greater than when it was committed; (3) every law that changes the punishment, and inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime when committed; (4) every law that alters the legal rules of evidence, and receives less or different testimony than the law required at the time of the commission of the offense, in order to convict the offender. Mr. Justice Chase, who delivered the opinion of the court, says: "But I do not consider any law ex post facto, within the prohibition, that mollifies the rigor of the criminal law; but only those that create or aggravate the crime, or increase the punishment, or change the rules of evidence for the purpose of conviction." Tested by these plain rules, there would be little difficulty in determining the question before us; but the courts have not contented themselves with this clear definition; and so it was held by Mr. Justice Washington, in his charge to the jury in a United States circuit court, that "an ex post facto law is one which in its operation makes that criminal which was not so at the time when the action was performed; or which increases the punishment; or, in short, which, in relation to the offense or its consequences, alters the situation of a party to his disadvantage." United States v. Hall, 2 Wash. C. C. 366.

In the case of Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 27 L. ed. 506, this last definition was quoted with the evident approval of the learned justice delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in that case, with a statement that the case was carried to the supreme court and the judgment affirmed, as reported in Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 87, 8 L. ed. 162; but a careful investigation of the opinion in the case last cited will show that the charge of Mr. Justice Washington was not considered, or even touched upon, in the opinion of the court. It will be seen that the familiar definition of Blackstone found in his Commentaries (vol. 1, p. 46) has been much enlarged by modern decisions.

Blackstone thus defines the meaning of an "ex post facto law:" "When, after an action, indifferent in itself, is committed, the Legislature then, for the first time, declares it to have been a crime, and inflicts a punishment upon the person who has committed it." Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (5th ed. p. 329), says: "But, so far as mere modes of procedure are concerned, a party has no more right in a criminal than in a civil action to insist that his case shall be disposed of under the law in force when the act to be investigated is charged to have taken place. Remedies must always be under the control of the Legislature, and it would create endless confusion in legal proceedings if every case was to be conducted only in accordance with the rules of practice, and heard only by the courts in existence when its facts arose. The Legislature may abolish courts and create new ones, and it may prescribe altogether different modes of procedure in its discretion, though it cannot lawfully, we think, in so doing, dispense with any of those substantial protections with which the existing law surrounds the person accused of crime. Statutes giving the government additional challenges, and others which authorized the amendment of indictments, have been sustained, and applied to past transactions, as doubtless would be any similar Statute, calculated merely to improve the remedy, and in its operation working no injustice to the defendant, and depriving him of no substantial right." This definition was accepted as most satisfactory in the case of Robinson v. State, 84 Ind. 452, where a statute, providing that, "in all questions affecting the credibility of a witness, his general moral character may be given in evidence," was held not to be an ex post facto law. The court says: "The Statute is general, and applies to the trial of all criminal cases. It furnishes merely a rule of practice applicable alike to trials for offenses committed before and after its passage. It does not come within the constitutional inhibition of an ex post facto law." Vide Ex parte Bethurum, 66 Mo. 545. The celebrated case of Kring v. Missouri, supra, was a step further in the direction of enlarging the meaning and definition of an ex post facto law. Kring had pleaded guilty to murder in the second degree, and his conviction of this crime, under the law of Missouri in force at the time of the commission of the crime, was an acquittal of the crime of murder in the first degree. The Constitution of Missouri had been changed after the commission of the crime in such manner as to abrogate this provision. The Supreme Court of the United States, by a bare majority of the justices, held this constitutional provision to be an ex post facto law, and that it could not apply to offenses committed prior to the taking effect thereof. Counsel for the petitioner urge with great force the following language of Mr. Justice Miller, who delivered the opinion of the court, as a new definition of an ex post facto law: "Can the law with regard to bail, to indictments, to grand juries, to the trial jury, all be changed to the disadvantage of the prisoner by state legislation after the offense was committed, and such legislation not be held to be ex post facto because it relates to procedure, as it does, according to Mr. Bishop? And can any substantial right which the law gave the defendant, at the time to which his guilt relates, be taken away from him by ex post facto legislation, because, in the use of a modern phrase, it is called a law of procedure? We think it cannot." The learned justice who delivered this opinion did not seem to be satisfied with the definition, as he restates the definition in the case of Re Medley, 184 U. S. 160, 83 L. ed. 885, as follows: "The term 'ex post facto law,' as found in the provision of the Constitution of the United States, to wit, that 'no State shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts,' has been held to apply to criminal laws alone, and has been often the subject of construction in this court. Without making extracts from these decisions, it may be said that any law which was passed after the commission of the offense for which the party is being tried is an ex post facto law when it inflicts a greater punishment than the law annexed to the crime at the time it was committed (Caldwell v. Bull, 3 U. S. 8 Dall. 386, 390, 1 L. ed. 648, 650; Kring v. Missouri, 107 U. S. 221, 27 L. ed. 506; Fletcher v. Peck, 10 U. S. 6 Cranch, 87, 3 L. ed. 162), or which alters the situation of the accused to his disadvantage; and that no one can be criminally punished in this country, except according to a law prescribed for his government by the sovereign authority before the imputed offense was committed, or by some law passed afterwards, by which the punishment is not increased."

This is a material change in the definition given in the case of Kring v. Missouri, and it now remains to be seen whether or not the situation of the accused has been altered to his disadvantage. We do not see that it has. How does the change in the accusing tribunal take away any substantial rights of the accused? He admits himself, by his solemn plea of guilty, to be rightfully accused of a grade of the offense with which he is charged, and this presumably by the advice of his counsel, after due time has been given to him to plead, and after he has deliberately withdrawn his plea of not guilty. Should he now be heard to complain that a grand jury of sixteen men, as required by the law in force at the time of the commission of the offense, might not have indicted him? He admits his guilt, and after conviction and sentence says that he was not properly accused. This is a travesty upon justice, and illustrates the absurdity of the proposition laid down by some of the courts. It has, however, been recently held by the Supreme Court of Montana, in the case of State v. Ah Jim, 9 Mont. 167, that the constitutional provision there reducing the number of grand jurors from sixteen to seven, five of whom must concur in the finding of an indictment, is self-executing; and the court quotes with approval the following cases to show that such provisions apply to offenses committed before the passage of a law, and are not ex post facto in their nature or effect: Cooley, Const. Lam. 272, 331, 332; People v. Mortimer, 46 Cal. 114; Bishop, Stat. Crimes, §§ 178, 180.

In the California case (People v. Mortimer, supra), it was held that "it is not an uncommon practice to change the number of grand jurors required to investigate criminal charges, but we have never heard the right of the Legislature to make such changes questioned; neither has it ever been claimed that the charge must be investigated by the precise number of grand jurors of which that body was composed at the time the act was committed;" and the Missouri case was noticed in this opinion of the Montana court. So, then, it was held that the reduction in the number of the accusing body did not invade any substantial right of the defendant. If the broad definition of Mr. Justice Miller in the Kring Case, apparently modified in the case of Re Medley, supra, was followed, it would seem that such a change in the number of the grand jury might be the loss of a substantial right to the accused. If the defendant has an unalterable right to be accused by indictment, it would seem that he has a right to be presented by twelve men out of sixteen, if such law existed at the time of the commission of the offense; and that if a reduction in the number of the grand jury is not a change in his substantial rights, to his disadvantage, the abolition of the accusing body itself would not be. He has been presented by a sworn officer, and, under our law, an official under bond, and the information must have been sworn to, as the law requires it. It was held in the case of Marion v. State, 20 Neb. 233, that although a law in force at the time of the commission of an offense (murder) provided that juries should be the judges of the law, and was repealed before the trial, it was competent to make the judge, instead of the jury, judge of the law of the case as the Legislature could make such a change, and that such a law was not ex post facto. The court adhered to its definition of an "ex post facto law" made in the case of Marion v. State, 16 Neb. 349, which is nearly in line with the definitions given heretofore, and says: "The procedure only has been changed. The degree of punishment, the character of the offense, and the rules of evidence remain as under the former law. It may be observed that the only change in the law is to provide another tribunal to pass upon the law of the case. Prior to the change, if the words in the former Code are to be taken at their full meaning and import, the jury were the judges as to the law of the case on trial. After the change, the court sits in that capacity, and is the judge of the law. No vested right of the plaintiff in error is affected. A new tribunal may be erected, or a new jurisdiction given to try him, and no right is abridged." Com. v. Phillips, 11 Pick. 28.

Now, certainly, here was a change in the powers of the trial jury. They were stripped of the right to act as judges of the law, and the court was clothed with that power, and yet this was held to be no infraction of the rights of the defendant. In the case of People v. Tisdale, 57 Cal. 104, a case upon which the counsel for the petitioner greatly rely, and which they state to be the only case directly in point, found after the utmost diligence, the court said: "The real and only question is whether an information presented after the repeal of a law, which required that a person who violated it should be proceeded against by indictment, can be sustained for an offense committed before the repeal." That court held that the law was not intended to be retrospective, like ours. It also held that a constitutional guaranty such as existed at the time the respondents were charged with the violation of a Statute could not be taken away by any Act of the Legislature. This seems to be the view taken by the Supreme Court of Washington, in the case of McCarty v. State, 1 Wash. 377. In this case the offense occurred before the admission of the State into the Union, and the court there held that the guaranty of the Constitution of the United States was in force at the time of the commission of the offense, and could not be taken away, and that the defendant was entitled to be presented by a grand jury. This was held evidently with much hesitation, as the court announces on the petition for a rehearing that in view of the public importance of the question, and in view of the fact that the case was submitted without oral argument on the part of the State, it would not be bound by the opinion rendered on the constitutional questions involved. The situation of the petitioner here is different. The Constitution of Wyoming was in force five months before the offense was committed, and the only constitutional guaranty which was given to the defendant, except as to the passage of an ex post facto law, was that, "until otherwise provided by law, no person shall for a felony be proceeded against criminally, otherwise than by indictment, except," etc. It has been otherwise provided by law, and the defendant has not been deprived of any constitutional guaranty. The framers of our Constitution did not mean to follow the language of the Federal Constitution that "no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of public danger." The intention appears plainly in our Constitution that there should be no constitutional guaranty of a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, and that nothing should impede the right of the Legislature to change, regulate, or abolish the grand-jury system.

We cannot refrain from alluding to one provision of the law before us. It is provided in Kansas and in Michigan, by statute, that no information shall be filed until a preliminary examination has been had, unless such examination be waived, except in cases of fugitives from justice. This safe rule was enlarged so that a prosecuting attorney may file an information when he is satisfied that a crime has been committed. This is a dangerous power to lodge in the hands of a prosecuting officer, for he may keep a prisoner, unable to give bail, in durance, without a preliminary examination, until the next term of court, which may be months ahead. The law makes provision for preliminary examinations, and the accused ought to have this hearing, or an opportunity for it, where he can introduce witnesses in his behalf,—a privilege not accorded to him before a grand jury, one of the strong arguments for dispensing with that ex parte tribunal. We do not now intimate how we would decide this matter if properly before us, but we deem it proper to call attention to it, so that under the new practice there may be no excuse for following a dangerous method of procedure. We are forcibly impressed with one fact that crops out in the examination of this question. In the States of Michigan, Kansas, and Wisconsin, the ordinary method of accusation in criminal cases is by information, and has been for years. In Kansas and Michigan, and probably in Wisconsin, no provision was made as to offenses committed prior to the passage of the law providing for prosecutions by means of information, and yet not a single case has been found where the question raised here has been presented to the court of last resort in any of these States, although such cases must have arisen. It is a strong presumption that such prosecutions as to past offenses were universally conceded to be legal, although the Constitutions of these States surely contain the familiar provision that "no ex post facto law shall ever be passed." Even if such a clause does not appear there, it is in the Federal Constitution, and this is as much an inhibition upon the Legislature of the States as if it had been incorporated in the State Constitution. Ex parte Bethurum, 66 Mo. 545. We do not favor the practice of looking into the constitutionality of a statute in habeas corpus proceedings. In the States of Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Texas, and Iowa, in habeas corpus, the courts will not look beyond the judgment and re-examine the charges on which it was rendered, or pronounce the judgment an absolute nullity, on the ground that the constitutionality of the Statute under which the conviction took place, or upon which the indictment was based, is controverted. That question, it is said, must be tested on appeal, writ of error, or trial in the appropriate court. Church, Habeas Corpus, § 370, and the cases there cited. But the Supreme Court of the United States in Ex parte Siebold, 100 U. S. 371, 25 L. ed. 717, has established a different doctrine; and this seems now to be the rule in habeas corpus, as the learned author of the work above cited states: "But we apprehend the true rule to be that when a prisoner alleges that the law under which he was convicted and sentenced is unconstitutional, or has been repealed before the trial and judgment, he may have these matters passed upon by the highest judicial tribunals, whether the attack upon the judgment be collateral, as by habeas corpus, or direct, as by appeal or writ of error." Church, Habeas Corpus, § 370.

We do not see that the law of this State providing for prosecutions by information is ex post facto in its nature, nor that it has infringed any of the substantial rights of the petitioner, nor that he has lost any constitutional guaranty; and, entertaining these views, the demurrer to the answer and to the return of the sheriff must be overruled, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Larimer County.

COLORADO SUPREME COURT.

Re John CUMMINS.

The illegal purpose of a person from whom money is obtained by false pretenses is no defense to an indictment against the person thus obtaining it.

NOTE.—As stated in the opinion, delivered in the principal case, the authorities bearing upon the question involved cannot be reconciled. It is pertinent to remark that Mr. Bishop's views are republished in 13 L. R. A.

(October 5, 1891.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of habeas corpus to procure petitioner's release from the Las Animas County jail to which he had been committed in default of bail for his appearance to answer the charge of obtaining money by false pretenses. Petitioner remanded.

dictated by the Wisconsin Supreme Court in the course of a singularly exhaustive opinion, in which the few cases discussing the subject are carefully reviewed. The conclusion reached is in the fol-

Statement by Hayt, J.:

In June, 1891, petitioner was examined before a justice of the peace in and for Las Animas County under four separate and distinct charges of obtaining money under false pretenses. As a result of such examinations he was required in each case to give bond for his appearance at the next succeeding term of the district court to be held in Las Animas County to answer such charges, or, upon a failure so to do, to be committed to the common jail of the county to await the action of the grand jury. The petitioner failing to furnish bond, warrants of commitment were issued, upon which he was incarcerated in the county jail. Thereupon he made application to the honorable J. C. Gunter, judge of the Third Judicial District, to be discharged upon a writ of habeas corpus. After a full hearing upon such application the prisoner was remanded to custody. It appeared, however, from the complaint, as well as by the evidence, that the money which he had obtained by the alleged false pretenses was paid in each instance by the prosecuting witnesses, respectively, in the furtherance of an illegal purpose to obtain by fraud valuable coal lands from the United States. The application is now renewed in this court.

Messrs. Dixon & Dixon for petitioner.

Mr. H. B. Babb, with Mr. J. H. Maupin, Atty-Gen., contra:

The statute says: "If any person or persons shall knowingly and designedly, by any false pretense or pretenses, obtain from any other person or persons, any chose in action, money, goods, wares, chattels, effects, or other valuable thing whatsoever, with intent to cheat or defraud any such person or persons of the same, every person so offending shall be deemed a cheat, and upon conviction shall be fined," etc. Sess. Laws 1889, p. 111.

In statutory construction words must be given their most usual signification and plainest meaning.

Sutherland, Stat. Const. §§ 237, 238, and cases cited.

The authorities are in hopeless conflict, the courts of New York and Wisconsin holding that the law was not intended to protect any person who is particeps criminis with the accused, and the courts of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts holding that such a defense cannot be sustained.

See McCord v. People, 46 N. Y. 470; People v. Stetson, 4 Barb. 157; State v. Crowley, 41 Wis. 271, 22 Am. Rep. 720; and contra, Com. v. Henry, 22 Pa. 253; Com. v. Morrill, 8 Cush. 571.

The New York cases are based upon the proposition that "neither the law nor public policy designs the protection of rogues in their dealings with each other, or to insure fair dealing and truthfulness, as between each other, in their dishonest practices."

But criminal suits are designed for the punishment of offenses against public right, and are conducted in the name of the State or crown.

Wharton, Cr. L. § 1; Bishop, Cr. L. § 32, and citations; Cooley, Torts, 1st ed. p. 6; Rector v. State, 6 Ark. 187; People v. Ontario County Suprs. 4 Denio, 260. See also dissenting opinion of Peckam, J., in McCord v. People, supra.

The authorities relied upon by petitioners proceed on the theory that the injured party, and not the public, is concerned with the punishment of offenders, in accordance with some of the preamble of the Act of 30 Geo. II, chap. 24, from which the Statutes are supposed to have been copied.

People v. Clough, 17 Wend. 351.

That theory may be correct in England, but in America the prosecution is instituted and conducted by an officer of the State, and in theory the injured party has no more interest in the punishment of the offense than any other citizen.

This proceeding cannot be perverted so as to make it perform the functions of either a writ of error, a grand jury, or the proceeding of a trial court; and this court has no jurisdiction, in this proceeding, to review the magistrate's judgment.

The rule that judgments cannot thus be collaterally attacked applies to judgments rendered by all inferior courts.

Hayt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If two persons conspire together to accomplish an unlawful purpose, and one, by false pretenses, obtains money from the other, which the latter parts with in furtherance of the illegal purpose, will a prosecution lie against the former for obtaining the money under false pretenses? This is the substantial question presented upon the record. Counsel for petitioner contend that it will not, while the affirmative is assumed by the attorney-general. The authorities bearing upon the question cannot be reconciled. In the leading cases of Com. v. Henry, 22 Pa. 253, and McCord v. People, 46 N. Y. 470, exactly opposite conclusions were reached upon facts that are quite similar. In the former case it was alleged in the indictment following language: "After much investigation and deliberation, we have reached the conclusion that the rule of the New York cases is supported by the better reasons, as well as by the weight of authority, and it is our duty to adopt it. We do so with hesitation, because able judges and courts have held a different rule; and with reluctance, because the acts of the defendants were outrageous and indefensible, and richly merit punishment. But it is far better that they should escape than that sound legal rules should be disregarded to meet the supposed exigencies of a particular case." State v. Crowley, 41 Wis. 271. F. S. R.

ment that the defendant, intending to defraud the prosecutor, falsely asserted to him, and also to another person, who communicated it to him, that he had a legal warrant for the arrest of the daughter of the prosecutor for an offense punishable by a fine and imprisonment, and that he threatened to arrest her, by means of which representation he obtained from the prosecutor property of the value of $100. The trial court having quashed the indictment, its judgment was reversed by the supreme court and the indictment declared sufficient. In the case of McCord v. People, supra, the indictment charged the defendant with having falsely and fraudulently represented that he had a warrant for one Miller, and that Miller, believing said false representations, was induced to and did deliver to the defendant a gold watch and diamond ring. In this case it was held that, as the property had been voluntarily surrendered as an inducement to the officer to violate the law and disregard his official duties, the indictment could not be sustained; the court declaring that the Statute against obtaining money by false pretenses was designed to protect only those who for an honest purpose are induced by false or fraudulent representation to give credit, or part with their property, and not to protect those who do this for an unworthy or illegal purpose. The opinion of the court in this case is quite brief, while Peckham, J., filed an able and exhaustive dissenting opinion. In support of the majority opinion two cases are cited by the court, viz., People v. Williams, 4 Hill, 9; People v. Stetson, 4 Barb. 151. An examination of the former case shows it to be no authority upon the question presented here; the decision being simply to the effect that a false representation, to be within the Statute, must be such as is calculated to mislead persons of ordinary prudence and caution,—a conclusion not generally accepted elsewhere. 2 Bishop, Cr. L. § 438.

In People v. Stetson, supra, it seems, however, to have been determined that, if the owner in parting with his property, etc., was himself guilty of a crime, the indictment, under the statute, could not be sustained; and a similar conclusion was reached in State v. Crowley, 41 Wis. 271, in which case the information charged a conspiracy on the part of several defendants to defraud the prosecutor of his money, and, the proof showing that the conspiracy charged was in connection with an unlawful enterprise, in which the prosecutor and the defendants were particeps criminis, it was held that a conviction was not warranted. It appeared, also, that, had the prosecutor exercised common prudence and caution, he could not have been misled by the false pretenses by which he was induced to part with his money. In opposition to this doctrine, and in line with the Pennsylvania decision, we find Com. v. Morrill, 8 Cush. 571. Mr. Bishop, reviewing the different conclusions, says: "Another doctrine sustained in New York is that where, if the false pretenses were true, the person parting with his goods would be guilty of a crime therein, or where he actually commits an offense in parting with them, the indictment for the cheat cannot be maintained. On the other hand, the Massachusetts court appears to have directly discarded this doctrine. The point decided was that a defendant cannot set up, in answer to an indictment of this nature, any wrongful representation of the person injured concerning the goods charged to have been obtained through the false pretense. 'Supposing,' said Dewey, J., 'it should appear that [the individual defrauded] had also violated the Statute, that would not justify the defendants. If the other party had also subjected himself to a prosecution for a like offense, he also may be punished. This would be much better than that both should escape punishment because each deserved it equally.' And this view accords with the general spirit of the criminal law, wherein the fault of one man is not received in excuse for that of another; while the New York doctrine would introduce a well-known principle of civil jurisdiction into a system of laws to which it is alien." 2 Bishop, Cr. L. 7th ed. § 469.

Finding this conflict in the authorities, we are left free to decide the question propounded solely upon principle. In our opinion, the conclusion reached by Mr. Bishop is supported by the better reasons. The primary object of punishment is the suppression of crime; and, where both the prosecutor and defendant have violated the law, it is better that both be punished than the crime of one should be used to shield the other. When the plaintiff in a civil action is shown to have been guilty of a wrong in the particular matter about which he complains, he cannot ordinarily recover. But there is little chance to apply this rule to criminal prosecutions conducted by the State; the person defrauded being at most a prosecuting witness in the case, and not a party to the proceeding. The language of our Statute is plain. The false pretenses charged in this case are embraced within its express terms, and we are not in favor of sanctioning a rule that will permit offenders to escape by showing that another should also be punished.

The petitioner's application to be discharged will therefore be denied, and the prisoner remanded.

a receiver may be determined by the court on a petition where the statutes give the right to such use on payment of one half the cost of construction, and there is no right to a jury on the ground that it involves the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

(September 30, 1891.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of prohibition to prevent the court having charge of petitioner's road from allowing the Los Angeles Consolidated Electric Railroad Company to use part of petitioner's road, and from determining the compensation to be paid petitioner for such use. Application denied.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Houghton, Silent & Campbell, with Mr. S. C. Hubbell, for petitioner.

Messrs. Dom & Dom, S. C. Denson, and W. S. Goodfellow, with Messrs. John D. Pope and Chapman & Hendrick, contra.

Paterson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The Pacific Railway Company is the owner of a street railroad, operated by means of a wire cable, for the carriage of persons in the City of Los Angeles. On January 20, 1891, Edward W. Russell commenced an action against said Company, its stockholders, and a large number of creditors, alleging, among other matters, that he was a judgment creditor; that the Company was indebted in large sums to divers persons, without means or revenue to pay the same, except by the operation of its railroad system, and the proceeds thereof were wholly insufficient; that suits had been brought and many attachment suits would follow, unless steps be taken to prevent the same, and the operation of the road would be suspended; that to protect all parties a receiver was necessary; wherefore plaintiff prayed for the appointment of a receiver, to take charge of and control the property of said Company, and, if necessary, to sell the same for the payment of the debts. On the day the complaint was filed J. F. Crank was appointed receiver, with directions to take charge of the street railways owned by and under the control of the Pacific Railway Company, together with all its real and personal property and to manage and conduct the business thereof, and from time to time render his accounts. Crank qualified and took possession, and has ever since continued to operate the road under the order of the court. On January 26, 1891, the Los Angeles Consolidated Electric Railway Company presented to the superior court a petition in said cause, setting forth that the petitioner had entered upon the construction of its line of road, as authorized by certain ordinances, and in the further prosecution of its work it was necessary that it should intersect the tracks of the Pacific Railway Company, and run along the same for a distance of three blocks; and praying an order authorizing it to operate over and on said tracks for said distance, and directing the receiver to grant all necessary facilities therefor, and for a further order fixing the amount of compensation which petitioner should pay for the right to use the tracks as aforesaid. At the time fixed for hearing, the petitioners herein appeared, and objected to any proceedings being taken, on the ground that the court had no authority to grant the relief asked. The court overruled the objection, and decided that it had jurisdiction to determine the amount of damages which would be occasioned by making the connections referred to in the petition, and continued the matter for hearing to July 16, 1891. Thereupon petitioners applied to this court for an alternative writ of prohibition, which was granted. In response to the order to show cause why he should not be restrained from any further proceedings in said matter the judge filed an answer, admitting the facts stated, and alleging that the order appointing the receiver was made on motion of the plaintiff in the action, and with the consent of the defendants therein; that on February 13, 1891, the plaintiff Russell filed a petition setting forth that there was some doubt whether the order appointing the receiver was sufficient of itself to vest in him the title to the property, especially the real property, so as to enable him to exercise all the powers and perform all the duties which the exigencies of the case might require, and asking for an order directing the Pacific Railway Company to assign its property to the receiver; that the order was made as prayed for, with the consent of the Pacific Railway Company.

Section 499 of the Civil Code provides that "two lines of street railway, operated under different managements, may be permitted to use the same street, each paying an equal portion for the construction of the track and appurtenances used by said railways jointly; but in no case must two lines of street railway, operated under different managements, occupy and use the same street or tracks for a distance of more than five blocks consecutively." The petitioner contends that, as the ordinances granting the franchises do not provide how compensation shall be ascertained, the electric company must proceed under the provisions of subdivision 6 of section 465, Civil Code. That section is a part of the chapter on the enumeration of the powers of every railroad corporation, and provides that "every corporation whose railroad is, or shall be hereafter, intersected by any new railroad, shall unite with the owners of such new railroad in forming such intersection and connections, and grant facilities therefor; and, if the two corporations cannot agree upon the amount of compensation to be made therefor, or the points or the manner of such crossings, intersections, and connections, the same shall be ascertained and determined as is provided in title 7, pt. 3, Code of Civil Procedure." But title 7, pt. 3, prescribes rules for the assessment of compensation and damages (§ 1248, Code Civ. Proc.) inconsistent with the measure of compensation established by section 499, Civil Code, and the latter must control, as it relates particularly to street railroads. What counsel for the petitioner means to claim, doubtless, is that the procedure prescribed by title 7 must be followed; that there must be an effort to agree with the cable company as to the amount to be paid; and, upon disagreement, an action against the receiver in the manner and form required by the title on eminent domain, including a trial by jury, if the defendant insist upon it.

The question to be determined is simply whether the court, which, through its receiver, has the custody and control of the insolvent corporation's property, has the power to determine the compensation, viz., one half of the cost of the construction of the tracks and appurtenances used by the companies jointly, or whether the electric company must treat with the cable company, and, upon failure to agree as to the amount to be paid, bring an action therefor against the receiver, with the permission of the court. There are none of the elements of an ordinary condemnation proceeding involved in the litigation. There is no private property to be taken for public use,—no occasion to exercise the right of eminent domain. The cable company did not acquire by the grant of its franchise any proprietary interest in the street. There can be no private property in a street, except the fee of the owner, which is held subject to the easement as long as the public continue to use the street as a highway. "The maintenance of horse railroads and running of cars upon the public streets of the City of San Francisco, designed for the carriage of passengers, is a mere special mode of using the highway, nothing more. The right to maintain such a railroad does not exclude the public from the use of the street." Market St. R. Co. v. Central R. Co. 51 Cal. 586. The franchise of the cable company gave it no exclusive use of that portion of the street upon which its road was constructed. It gave to the company the right to construct its road in such a place and manner as not to interfere with the use of the street by the public. The material placed in the street, it is true, is still the property of the cable company; but it was placed where it is with full knowledge on the part of the company that the latter would have no exclusive right to its use, so long as it should remain in the street. The right of the public to drive vehicles over and upon its road, and the right of the mayor and council to grant to another street-car company a franchise to connect with its track, and to use the same for a distance not exceeding five blocks, entered into its contract with the city as fully, under the provisions of section 499, Civil Code, then in force, as if the condition had been expressly stated in the grant; and, as the cable company took its franchise with the understanding—in effect an express stipulation—that any other company authorized by the mayor and council might use the track jointly with itself, it cannot now be heard to say that such a taking is without its consent, and is a taking of private property for public use, which can be done only by proceedings under the Statute relating to eminent domain. The grant to the cable company was made to facilitate, not to abridge, the public use of the street; and, the subsequent franchise having been granted to the electric company in accordance with the provisions of the Statute, it cannot be said to be a taking of the property of the cable company for any higher or different purpose than that to which it had already been devoted. Civil Code, §§ 497-499; Omnibus R. Co. v. Baldwin, 57 Cal. 178; Jersey City & H. H. R. Co. v. Jersey City & B. R. Co. 21 N. J. Eq. 556; Kineman St. R. Co. v. Broadway & N. St. R. Co. 36 Ohio St. 239; Sixth Ave. R. Co. v. Kerr, 45 Barb. 138; People v. Kerr, 37 Barb. 357; Chicago & W. J. R. Co. v. Dunbar, 100 Ill. 188; St. Louis R. Co. v. Southern R. Co. (Mo.) 15 S. W. Rep. 1013, 16 S. W. Rep. 960.

If it be true that the grant of the franchise to the electric company gave to it an absolute right, under the Statute (§ 499, Civil Code), to use the tracks of the cable company upon payment of one half of the cost of construction of the tracks and appurtenances, used jointly by the companies, and that there is no question as to the right of eminent domain involved in the matter before us, the question whether the respondent has the right to fix the amount of damages or compensation to be paid by the electric company is a simple one. The property of the cable company is in custodia legis. The receiver is indifferent between the parties. His possession is the possession of the court for the benefit of all persons interested, whether named as parties in the action or not, and it cannot be disturbed without the consent of the court. No one claiming a right paramount to that of the receiver can assert it in any action without the permission of the court. No sale can take place, no debt can be paid, no contract can be made, which does not receive the sanction of the court. The receiver, with permission of the court, can do anything the corporation might have done to make the most out of the assets in his hands. It has been held that in a proper case he may settle disputed claims and compromise with debtors of the corporation; he may lease other lines of railways, and operate them; he may complete the construction of unfinished lines of railroad, and negotiate loans for the payment of the cost thereof; he may enter into contracts by the terms of which the owners of other roads may use the road under his control at given rates; and he may change the rates agreed upon prior to his appointment between the company he represents and another railroad corporation. Code Civ. Proc. § 568; Beach, Receivers, §§ 268, 335, 360, 406; Gluck & B. Receivers, pp. 106, 107, 181, 140, 241; Re New Jersey & N. Y. R. Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 67; Wiswall v. Sampson, 55 U. S. 14 How. 65, 14 L. ed. 328; Gibert v. Washington City, V. M. & G. S. R. Co. 33 Gratt. 586.

In the case before us the electric company has the right, under the Statute and its franchise, to use the tracks of the cable company upon payment of one half of the cost of the construction thereof. The only question to be determined is, What is the amount due the cable company? It is like any other claim for damages or compensation in favor of a corporation whose property is in the hands of a receiver, and is to be determined in the same way. As to the manner of determining such question there has been some discordance of opinion among judges, but, so far as we have investigated the subject, there has been no conflict of decision. The cases all hold that, while it is, under certain circumstances, proper to direct the prosecution of an action at law against the receiver to determine the amount of compensation or damages to be paid, the better and more commonly recognized practice is to apply for relief by petition to the court in which the receiver is acting. The rule applies to all cases of damages to person or property, whether occasioned prior or subsequent to the appointment of the receiver. Re Merrill, 54 Vt. 200; Redfield, Railways, 6th ed. 878, 380; High, Receiver, §§ 139, 255, 256; Mills, Em. Dom. § 75; Olyphant v. St. Louis, O. & Steel Co. 28 Fed. Rep. 729; Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 28 Fed. Rep. 871.

Any party deeming himself aggrieved by the judgment of the court has the right of appeal. Detroit First Nat. Bank v. Barnum Wire & L. Works, 58 Mich. 315; Porter v. Kingman, 126 Mass. 141.

It is claimed by petitioner that this view of the case deprives it of the right to have the question of compensation determined by a jury,—a right which is guaranteed to it by the Constitution, art. 1, § 14; but, as it is not a case involving the exercise of the right of eminent domain,—is not a taking of private property for public use,—the contention is without merit.

In Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 126, 26 L. ed. 672, the court, speaking to a similar objection, said: "The argument is much pressed that, by leaving all questions relating to the liability of receivers in the hands of the court appointing them, persons having claims against the insolvent corporation or the receiver will be deprived of a trial by jury. This, it is said, is depriving the party of a constitutional right.

... But those who use this argument lose sight of the fundamental principle that the right of trial by jury, considered as an absolute right, does not extend to cases of equity jurisdiction. If it be conceded or clearly shown that a case belongs to this class, the trial of questions involved in it belongs to the court itself, no matter what may be its importance or complexity. . . . The new and changed condition of things which is presented by the insolvency of such a corporation as a railroad company has rendered necessary the exercise of large and modified forms of control over its property by the courts charged with the settlement of its affairs and the disposition of its assets." See also Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 34 L. ed. 843.

It is unnecessary, in view of what has been said, to consider the questions raised by respondent, whether prohibition is the proper remedy, and whether the petitioner is competent to invoke it. The question as to whether the East & West Los Angeles Railroad Company sold or leased its tracks on Washington Street to the petitioner is a matter to be considered by the superior court on the hearing of the petition, and is not the subject of inquiry in this proceeding. Bishop v. Los Angeles Co. Super. Ct. 87 Cal. 233. The respondent declares in his answer filed herein that "neither the said court nor the judge thereof ruled or intimated that he had any power to fix the compensation or authorize the connection with any railway tracks not belonging to the Pacific Railway Company, or any property not in the custody and control of the court."

The application is denied, and the alternative writ is discharged.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

W. R. EMERICK

v.

(.....Iowa.....)

An aged person is not of unsound mind so as to require a guardian of his estate merely because he has not sufficient strength of mind and ability to transact his business.

ness, affairs with "ordinary care and prudence" if he is capable of transacting the ordinary business involved in taking care of his property, and understands the nature and effect of what he does, and can exercise his will concerning it with discretion, notwithstanding the influence of others.

(October 13, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Mills County ap-

NOTE.—Mere mental weakness will not justify the appointment of a guardian.

The unsoundness of mind which will justify the action of the court must be more than mere debility (Ex parte Cranmer, 12 Ves. Jr. 445), or impairment of memory. Re Holmes, 4 Russ. 182.

It is held in New Jersey that not every imbecility of mind is intended, but that the mind must be so unsound that it cannot apply its faculties, in their weakened and impaired state, to the management of the person's affairs, and the government of himself (Re Collins, 18 N. J. Eq. 255), and at the same time that it is enough if such incapacity of mind arises from any cause, whether it be age, disease, affliction, or intemperance. Perrine's Case, 41 N. J. Eq. 411.

Mental incapacity.

It is not every case of mental weakness or imbecility which will authorize the court of chancery to exercise the power of appointing a committee of the person and estate; but to justify the exercise of such a power the mind of the individual must be so far impaired as to be reduced to a state which, as an original incapacity, would have constituted a case of idiocy. Re Morgan, 7 Paige, 236, 4 L. ed. 138.

To authorize the appointment of a committee of the person and estate of one proceeded against as a lunatic or person of unsound mind, if he be not a lunatic, the unsoundness of mind is the essential thing, and must be established as an independent proposition, and his incapacity must be the result of such mental unsoundness. To sustain such proceedings, the fact must be clearly established, that the party proceeded against is of unsound mind. Re Shaul, 40 How. Pr. 204.

An early Massachusetts case decides that an inquisition by the selectmen that one is non compos, and an appointment of a guardian for that cause, are not justified by evidence that the person is old and has become less careful of his property. Darling v. Bennett, 8 Mass. 129.

Even where the facts proved show that the senses and physical powers are much impaired, and that the mental faculties are somewhat weakened, all this would fail to show anything that would amount to unsoundness so as to make him incapable of managing his affairs. He may be so weak and infirm as to be easily influenced or imposed upon, which would be a reason for setting aside any instruments or transactions executed under the effect of such influence, but this does not amount to unsoundness, such as to take from him the control of himself and his property. The presumption of law is not against the soundness of mind of a person one hundred years of age. Re Collins, 18 N. J. Eq. 253.

pointing a guardian of his estate on the ground that he was of unsound mind. Reversed.

Statement by Robinson, J.:

Plaintiff seeks to have appointed a guardian of the estate of defendant on the alleged ground that he is of unsound mind, and is not possessed of the judgment necessary for the management of his estate. The cause was tried to a jury, which found that defendant was of unsound mind. A judgment was rendered on the verdict, and defendant appeals.

Messrs. Scott Lewis and H. C. Watkins, for appellant:

The definition which the court gave to the jury is of too high a character and fixes too high a standard as to what constitutes in law a person of unsound mind, and is not the true test.

■ Smith v. Hickenbottom, 57 Iowa, 788; Seerley v. Sater, 68 Iowa, 375.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This proceeding was instituted under section 2272 of the Code. The petition alleges that defendant owns and has the management of an estate of 557 acres of land, situated in Mills County, of the value of about $20,000; that he is old and infirm, and of unsound mind, and is not possessed of the judgment necessarily required for the management of his estate; that he has become possessed of the delusion that he can make large sums of money in the real-estate business in Nebraska, and for the purpose of engaging in such business he has contracted to sell his real estate for four or five thousand dollars less than it is worth; that his wife exerts an undue influence over him, to the detriment of himself and his property; that by reason of his infirmities of mind and body, and the undue influence of his wife, he has been attempting to dispose of his property in various ways, and place it under the control of his wife or her friends; and that he has not sufficient mind to resist her undue influence. Defendant admits the ownership of the land as claimed by plaintiff, but denies that he is of unsound mind, and that he is subject to undue influence. The defendant was seventy-nine years old at the time of the trial in the district court. Two years before that time his wife died, and a year and a half after her death he married his present wife. She was active in bringing about the marriage, and some of the evidence tends to show that she became a party to it for mercenary reasons, and that she attempts to influence improperly her husband against his children, of whom plaintiff is one. There is evidence to show that defendant is easily influenced to become surety for irresponsible persons, and that he has incurred losses by so doing. He admits having contracted to sell his land for $25 per acre, but it is not certain that it is worth much, if any, more than that amount. The evidence as to his mental capacity was conflicting, and, had the jury found that he was of sound mind, the verdict would not have been without support in the evidence. That being the condition of the case, the court charged the jury, in substance and effect, that a person of sound mind is one who exercises ordinary understanding and ability in the transaction of business, and that, if defendant was not possessed of "sufficient strength of mind and ability to transact his business affairs with ordinary care and prudence, then, in law, he will be deemed of unsound mind." The question presented for our determination is whether the test of mental unsoundness given by the court is correct.

Section 2272 of the Code provides for the appointment of a guardian of the property and minor children of a "person of unsound mind." The Statute is silent as to what shall constitute

In Perrine's Case, 41 N. J. Eq. 409, 411, Chancellor Runyon said that it is enough to warrant the interference of the court, if, from any cause, a person has become incapable of managing his own affairs; and he referred for support to Lord Eldon, in Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. Jr. 266, and Chancellor Kent, in Re Barker, 2 Johns. Ch. 222, 1 L. ed. 358. But in these cases the attention of the judges was turned more to the source and nature of the mental infirmity than to its extent, and they must not be understood as holding that weakness of mind which does not amount to idiocy, or lunacy, or unsoundness of mind, and does not deprive a man of the power of governing himself, would justify a court in placing him and his estate under guardianship. The opinions of Lord Lyndhurst, in Re Holmes, 4 Russ. 182, and of Chancellor Walworth, in Re Morgan, 7 Paige, 236, 14 L. ed. 138, indicate that such is not the law. Lord Eldon himself, in Sherwood v. Sanderson, 19 Ves. Jr. 280, 286, declared that, if the jury merely find the incapacity of the party to manage his affairs, and will not infer, from that and other circumstances, unsoundness of mind though the party may live where he is exposed to ruin every instant, yet upon that finding the commission cannot go on.

If a court can see that there were no equitable incidents, such as undue influence, great ignorance and want of advice, very inadequate price, and the like, it would not interfere merely because one 18 L. R. A.

party possessed very much less intelligence than the other, nor because the transaction is not one which the court in all respects approves. Ball v. Mannin, 3 Bligh. N. S. 1; *Osmond v. F. S. R.

the unsoundness which it contemplates, but it is clear that it relates to the capacity of the person affected to transact business. The protection of property is one of the main objects of such statutes as that under consideration, and the test of the unsoundness in question is largely the incompetency of the person to manage property in a rational manner. 1 Wharton & S. Medical Jurisp. § 108. A person may be so weak and infirm as to be easily influenced in such manner that the transactions had under the effect of such influence will be set aside, and yet not be so unsound of mind as to warrant the appointment of a guardian of his property. Id. § 104. The unsoundness of mind which will justify such an appointment must be more than mere debility or impairment of memory. It must be such as to deprive the person affected of ability to manage his estate. Re Lindsey, 48 N. J. Eq. 9.

The fact that a person, by reason of age, ignorance, and feeble condition of mind and body, is unfit to manage his estate judiciously will not authorize the appointment of a guardian of his property. Com. v. Reeves, 140 Pa. 258. "Imbecility of mind is not sufficient to set aside a contract when there is not an essential privation of the reasoning faculties or an incapacity of understanding and acting with discretion in the ordinary affairs of life." 2 Kent, Com. 609. "Courts of law, as well as equity, afford protection to those who are of unsound mind. They endeavor to draw a line between sanity and insanity, but cannot so well distinguish between degrees of intelligence." 1 Parsons, Cont. 387. "The law does not assume to measure the different degrees of power of the human intellect, or to distinguish between them where the power of thought and reason exists." Somers v. Pumphrey, 24 Ind. 245.

In Davren v. White, 42 N. J. Eq. 569, there was evidence to show that the person whose act was in question lacked mental capacity. But the court held that the test in such cases is, "Did the person whose act is brought in judgment possess sufficient ability at the time he did the act to understand in a reasonable manner the nature and effect of his act or the business he was transacting?" "Although the mind of an individual may be to some extent impaired by age or disease, still, if he be capable of transacting his ordinary business, if he understand the nature of the business in which he is engaged, and the effect of what he is doing, and can exercise his will with reference thereto, his acts will be valid." English v. Porter, 109 Ill. 291. In Fiscus v. Turner, 125 Ind. 46, a rule was approved as follows: "Unsoundness of mind is where there is an essential privation of the reasoning faculties, or where a person is incapable of understanding and acting with discretion in the ordinary affairs of life." A court of equity will not ordinarily set aside a transaction on the ground of mere weakness of understanding, or liability to be sometimes deceived and duped, on the part of one of the parties to it. Such party must be, in a legal sense, of unsound mind. Henderson v. McGregor, 30 Wis. 80.

Some of the authorities cited refer to the mental capacity which is sufficient to enable a person to enter into a valid contract. Cases may arise where a person competent to make such a contract is so subject to an improper influence, or is so affected by some delusion, or is so liable to be controlled to his prejudice by some other cause, that he should be deprived of the right to manage his property; but ordinarily a person who has sufficient mental capacity to make a valid agreement in regard to his property, and to manage it with reasonable care, unaffected by another's will, should be permitted to retain it. It is manifest that there may be such a degree of mental capacity less than that possessed by persons of ordinary understanding and ability. The deficiency may be due to ignorance, or a want of shrewdness, or to other causes which do not denote unsoundness of mind. If a person may be deprived of the control of his property, because he does not exercise ordinary understanding, ability, and prudence in managing it, large numbers of people who now display a reasonable degree of care and judgment in accumulating, keeping, and disposing of property may be deprived of the right to do so, because the business skill and ability they manifest is not quite equal to that commonly exercised. We do not think such a rule as that should prevail.

In Seerley v. Sater, 68 Iowa, 376, it was said that "a person of unsound mind is one incapable of transacting the particular business in hand." The question to be determined in this case was whether defendant was capable of managing his estate, not whether he was capable of managing it as well as such estates are commonly managed. No general rule can be given which will be alike applicable to all cases, but each must be determined largely by its own facts and the conditions which control it. In this case, if defendant is capable of transacting the ordinary business involved in taking care of his property, and if he understands the nature of the business, and the effect of what he does, and can exercise his will with reference to such business with discretion, notwithstanding the influence of others, he is not of unsound mind, within the meaning of the Statute, and should not be deprived of the control of his property. The charge of the district court required a higher degree of mental capacity than that, and is to that extent erroneous. Other questions are discussed by counsel, but, as they are not likely to arise on another trial, need not be determined.

1. The name of the political party sufficiently appears at the head of a ticket where it is combined in a vignette, without repeating the name in a separate heading.

2. The regularity of either of the tickets nominated by the separate divisions of a split convention cannot be determined by election commissioners in preparing ballots, but they must print thereon the names of both sets of candidates and give for each set the party name as certified by the committee presenting it, without addition or distinctive designation.

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel the election commissioners for the City of Detroit to print a certain ticket upon the official ballots which they were about to prepare for use at a coming election.
Granted.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion.

Messrs. Don M. Dickinson, J. Logan Chipman and George V. N. Lothrop, with Mr. Alfred Russell, for petitioners.

Messrs. John J. Speed and Charles S. McDonald for respondents.

Per Curiam :

The petition of the relators sets forth the appointment of the respondents as election commissioners of the City of Detroit on the 6th day of October inst.; and also of the calling of the Democratic city convention for the nomination of city officers; the holding of such convention and the proceedings had thereat; and the fact that such convention divided, and two tickets were nominated,—one of them headed by William G. Thompson for mayor, and the other by John Miner, also for mayor; that the committee of that branch of the Democratic party supporting John Miner for mayor prepared a ticket consisting of the officers nominated by the convention, and also a vignette consisting of a right arm holding a flag, upon which was printed the words, "Regular Democratic Ticket," duly certified by them, which was presented to each member of the board of election commissioners, with a request that it be printed upon the ballots to be voted at the election to be held on the 3d day of November prox. They further set up that the election commissioners refuse to say whether they will print such tickets or not, but, from rumors and reports, they believe it is the intention of the election commissioners not to print such ticket upon the ballot authorized by law to be voted; that they have inquired of such commissioners whether they intend to print such ticket, and such commissioners have refused to give any answer to such inquiry. They ask for a mandamus to be directed to the members of the board of election commissioners, commanding them to "organize, and proceed to prepare, and cause to be printed, ballots bearing upon them, as the regular Democratic ticket, the ticket and candidates and vignette embraced in the certificate of relators hereinbefore set forth;" and that the said John Christ Jacob, Joseph T. Lowry, and Augustus G. Kronberg, board of election commissioners of the City of Detroit, be commanded to place upon the ballot for the municipal election to be held in the City of Detroit on November 3, 1891, in a regular and due form, the list of candidates for mayor and city offices, named and embraced in the certificate hereinbefore referred to. The board of election commissioners have answered the petition, stating that they met on the 26th day of October, and organized as a board, and elected as chairman John Christ Jacob, and G. Henrion as secretary; that at such session they directed the secretary to insert in the daily newspapers a notice that the board of election commissioners for the City of Detroit would be in session at the city clerk's office in the city hall on Tuesday and Wednesday, October 27 and 28, 1891, at noon on said days, for the purpose of receiving from the chairmen of the several political organizations the names of the persons nominated to the several city and ward offices to be filled at the coming charter election, and that the proof copy of the ballot which is to be prepared by said board of election commissioners would be open for the inspection of the chairman of each of the political organizations on Saturday and Monday, October 31 and November 2, at the office of the city clerk in the city hall. It sets forth that the notices were published in certain papers, naming them. It also states that at a session of the board held on October 27 there was filed with said board a certificate, a copy of which, signed by William J. Shields as chairman, is set forth in said petition; that prior to said meeting of October 27 there was not at any time presented to said board any certificate from any committee of any political party setting forth the names of candidates for office to be voted for at the next charter election to be held in said city; that on receiving said certificate said board directed its secretary to place such certificate on file, and to notify William Cosgrove, the secretary named in said certificate, that said certificate was informal, for the reason that it did not designate the name of a party or political organization which the said chairman and secretary represented. They deny that they had, as individuals or as a board, expressed any intention as to their individual action, or any opinion as to how the said board should determine any question which might arise as to the printing upon the election ballots the names of the candidates mentioned in said certificate, and for the reason that they desired to avoid discussion with or the importunities of personal or political friends in relation to the printing of said tickets; and they admit that when approached they each declined, excepting when acting as a board, to express any such opinion or determination. They deny that as a board of election commissioners, or as individuals, a majority of said board, or either of them, claimed the right to decide as to the tickets, one of which is headed by John Miner as a candidate for mayor, and the other by William G. Thompson as a candidate for said office, as to which one was nominated by the regularly called convention of any party, or to decide which was the regularly called convention, as between the convention which nominated the ticket headed by said Miner and the convention which nominated the ticket headed by Thompson. They also deny the allegations in the petition impugning their good faith and honesty as members of said board. They further answer, and aver that, "they have not as a board, excepting as hereinbefore stated, acted upon or determined as to the printing of said names on said ballots, but respondents aver that at a meeting of their board held on the 28th day of October, 1891, said board by resolution determined to print, on the official ballot which they are to prepare, all the names of candidates for any and all of the several city, ward and precinct offices, which have been nominated by the regularly called convention of the several political parties, and which shall be duly certified to said board by the respective chairman and secretary of said organizations, and, unless otherwise ordered by your honorable court, it is the intention of respondents to print the names of all the candidates on the so-called Miner and Thompson Democratic ticket. Respondents also determined to print on the official ballot any vignette which the various political organizations may designate, provided said party supply respondents with a sufficient number of cuts in time to enable them to use the same."

In closing their said answer, respondents state as follows: "These respondents respectfully submit themselves to the order of the court, and they pray, if any order be made herein, that they may be advised thereby whether they are required by law to determine which of the list of candidates nominated as aforesaid they should cause to be printed on the ballots prepared by them, or whether they should print on said ballots both of said lists of candidates; and they pray to be further advised if the same name of a party shall be certified by both of two committees, whether the names so certified shall be printed without further addition or distinctive designation."

We are clearly of the opinion that the board of election commissioners was in error in supposing that the notice sent by Mr. Shields, and served upon them, was defective for the reason that it did not designate the name of a party or political organization which the said chairman or secretary represented. The vignette, which was a part of the certificate and notice served upon the board, combined within it the name of the party or political organization which they represented, and, where the name of the party is combined with the vignette, it is not necessary to put another heading below it. The petition shows that the call for a convention of the Democratic party of the City of Detroit resulted in two nominating conventions; and we are of opinion that each of the tickets nominated at such convention containing the names of the persons nominated by such conventions, with the vignette and heading, if any is furnished by the committee of such conventions, should be printed upon the ballot. We do not consider that it is the province of the board of election commissioners to determine which convention represented the regular nominating convention of the party; but that it is the duty of said board to print and place upon the ballot the names of the candidates certified to them by the committee of either branch of the party represented by the two conventions held to nominate city officers, and that the names so certified to them in each list shall be embraced in the ticket so printed; and that it is their duty, further, if the same name of a party shall be certified by each of two committees, that the name so certified shall be printed without further addition or distinctive designation than such as is contained in the certificates furnished. And, inasmuch as the respondents request that they may be advised therein upon the points stated in their answer, the order for mandamus will issue, commanding them to print upon the ballots to be prepared by them the ticket so furnished to them by the committee of the convention who placed in nomination John Miner for mayor, and also the vignette furnished them by the committee, and that the tickets so printed by them shall contain the name of each of the candidates nominated for the respective offices by said convention in the form substantially prescribed by the Statute, with the name which the committee certify to them as the distinctive name of the party, without further addition or distinctive designation. As the answer denies any design to avoid the law or their duty as election commissioners, no costs will be awarded against them.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

Thomas RUTLEDGE, Appt.,

v.

R. F. CRAWFORD, Resp't.

(.....Cal.....)

1. A ballot having on its back "an offset" or faint impression of the printing on a similar ticket will not be rejected under Pol. Code, § 1206, as bearing any device, etc., designed to distinguish it, without proof that the impression was the result of design.

2. The presumption is that an "offset" or faint impression of printing on the back of a ballot, or a grease stain or small piece of sealing wax thereon, was the result of accident.

NOTE.—Marks or devices to distinguish ballots.

In Mississippi, where the statute expressly declares that "any device or mark" by which a ticket may be distinguished shall make it invalid, the 18 L. R. A.

courts hold that they cannot determine the materiality of any such device or mark but that it is necessarily fatal. Steele v. Calhoun, 61 Miss. 556; Oglesby v. Sigman, 58 Miss. 502.

3. A small piece of sealing wax or a small grease stain on the back of a ballot will not prevent counting it, unless it is shown not to be accidental.
4. A ticket having the names of two candidates for judge and one for senator, arranged and numbered in consecutive order, cannot be counted for another candidate for judge whose name is written on the line for and in the place of the name of the senatorial candidate, which was erased.
5. The use of an indelible pencil in erasing and substituting the name of a candidate on a ballot is within the spirit of and a substantial compliance with a statute which requires it to be done with "a lead-pencil or common writing ink" in order to permit the ballot to be counted.

6. Red ink is common writing ink within the meaning of such a statute.
7. Erasing the name of a candidate will not prevent counting a ballot for him under the California statute, unless another is substituted or the words "no vote" written thereon after his name.
8. The failure of a contestant to file a statement sufficient to show his own eligibility to a disputed office will not prevent

In the last case the mark seems to have been merely a plain line as a border.

So a space less than that fixed by statute between the names on the ticket will make them void. Perkins v. Carraway, 59 Miss. 222.

But in most States the rule is less strict. Thus the word "judiciary" on the backs of judicial ballots of one candidate only does not render them void under a statute which prevents distinguishing marks. State v. Barden, 10 L. R. A. 155, 77 Wis. 401.

The word "for" before the name of each office does not invalidate a ballot under a statute prohibiting any words other than the official indorsement and the names of the candidates and the political party. Fields v. Osborne (Conn.) 12 L. R. A. 551.

But the words "and ex officio registrar of births, marriages and deaths" added to the office of town clerk, invalidate the ballot under that statute. Ibid.

So will the substitution of the word "citizen" for the name of the political party by which ballots are issued. Ibid.

And substituting the words "for assemblyman" instead of "for member of assembly" or the words "for superior judge" instead of "for judge of the superior court," and the omission of the word "senatorial" from "9th senatorial district" do not constitute distinguishing marks which will make the ballot invalid. Coffey v. Edmonds, 58 Cal. 526.

And where the name of the party is not required by statute the words "Democratic ticket," at the head of a ballot and "people's party" in the middle of it will not invalidate it. Williams v. State, 69 Tex. 369.

Neither at a presidential election will the words "election ticket" and the names of the candidates for president and vice-president and the counties where the electors reside. Owens v. State, 64 Tex. 500.

Marking the voter's number on ballots when given out by the officer makes them void under a statute prohibiting marks by which they can be identified. Woodward v. Sarsons, L. R. 10 C. P. 88.

So will the repetition in writing of the candidate's name printed thereon. Ibid.

So will the signature of the voter written thereon. Ibid.

But the use of two or three crosses instead of one, or of a peculiar form of the cross-mark, or of an additional mark, or of an oblique mark for a cross, or the placing of the cross-mark on the wrong side of the name of a candidate, will not invalidate the ballot without evidence of intent to distinguish it. Ibid.

And under a similar statute the words "Erase the clause you do not favor" will not vitiate a ballot which offers a choice of propositions. Applegate v. Egan, 74 Mo. 258.

The discoloration of a ballot from the use of ink by the voter in scratching the ballot is not a distinguishing mark which will make it invalid. Wyman v. Lemon, 51 Cal. 273.

Nor will printing which shows through on the back of the ballot constitute such distinguishing mark. State v. Adams, 65 Ind. 393.

Nor will a sticker or paster containing the name of a candidate make such a distinguishing device. Quinn v. Markoe, 37 Minn. 439.

But ballots with eagles on, cast at an election of a religious corporation where a by-law authorized by law prohibits anything thereon but names, are void. Com. v. Woelper, 3 Serg. & R. 22.

Color, size, and shape of ballots.

Ballots on colored paper have been held void under a statute which requires them to be printed on plain white paper without mark or designation. State v. McKinnon, 8 Or. 493.

But a later case in the same State, while not deciding whether the former case should be followed on similar facts, holds that such ballots are not void when they are printed on tinted paper selected for the purpose and furnished by the secretary of state. State v. Wolf, 17 Or. 119.

A similar rule is applied in California to ballots furnished by an officer where there were variations from the statutory requirements as to size, printing, and paper. Kirk v. Rhoads, 46 Cal. 398.

And under the Colorado statute which prohibits printing or distributing ballots on other than plain white paper, but does not expressly prohibit voting or counting them, ballots printed on pale yellow paper, which was the nearest like that required that could be found and used because the regular tickets had not come, were held valid. Kellogg v. Hickman, 12 Colo. 256.

And white paper tinged with blue with ruled lines was held a sufficient compliance with the Statute requiring the use of white paper without marks intended to distinguish the ballots, in the absence of evidence that such paper was used with intent to distinguish the ballots. People v. Kilduff, 15 Ill. 492.

Making tickets of diamond shape does not of itself amount to a "device" to distinguish them where the shape is not prescribed by statute. State v. Phillips, 63 Tex. 390.

Marks on the inside of ticket.

Under a statute which provides for tickets "without any distinguishing mark or other embellishment thereon," but permitting the voter to write his name on the back thereof, marks on the inside of a ticket, such as a party name for a heading, do not make the tickets void. Drullner v. State, 29 Ind. 308; Stanley v. Manly, 36 Ind. 275; Millholland v. Bryant, 39 Ind. 363.

But in Mississippi it is held that the prohibition of "any device or mark by which one ticket may be distinguished" from another applies to marks on the inside as well as on the outside of a ballot. Steele v. Calhoun, 61 Miss. 556; Oglesby v. Sigman, 68 Miss. 502; Perkins v. Carraway, 59 Miss. 222.

relief to the extent of annulling the certificate of election of the opposing candidate who has been illegally declared elected.

9. An amendment of the statement of a contestant of an election may be made to show his eligibility after the cause has been remanded from an appellate court.

(October 8, 1891.)

APPPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Sonoma County in favor of defendant in an action brought to contest defendant's right to act as one of the superior court judges for that county. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. T. J. Geary, with Mr. A. P. Ware, for appellant.

Messrs. C. S. Farvuar and J. A. Barham for respondent.

De Haven, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The parties to this action were opposing candidates for the office of superior judge of Sonoma County at the general election of 1890. The respondent, Crawford, received a certificate of election, and this is an action contesting his right thereto. As a result of the trial and recount in the superior court, it appearing that the defendant received one vote more than the plaintiff, the court, on motion of defendant, granted a nonsuit and dismissed the proceedings. The contestant appeals from this judgment, and claims that the court erred in counting certain ballots for the respondent, and in refusing to count others for the appellant.

1. Two ballots, regular on their face, and with the appellant's name printed thereon for judge of the superior court, were not counted by the court for the reason that there was on the back of each a faint type impression of a portion of the face of a similar ticket. The impression is known among printers as an "off-set," and, if there is too much ink upon the type used, is produced when one sheet is placed face downward upon the back of another, which has preceded it from the press. In our opinion the court erred in its refusal to count these ballots for appellant.

Section 1206 of the Political Code Provides: "When a ballot found in any ballot-box bears upon the outside thereof any impression, device, color or thing, or is folded in a manner designed to distinguish such ballot from other legal ballots deposited therein, it must, with all its contents, be rejected." Prior to the adoption of the Code, it was the usual practice to have the tickets of the different political parties of a different color or weight or size, so that an observer at the polls could see at a glance and detect which party ticket was deposited by the voter. It was to prevent this, and secure to the citizen absolute secrecy for his ballot, that the section above quoted, and others of the same Code, were enacted, prescribing for ballots, uniformity of paper, color and size; and, in order to justify the rejection of a ballot under this section, it must appear that such "impression, device, color or thing," on the outside thereof, was intended to distinguish it from other legal ballots (Wyman v. Lemon, 51 Cal. 273); and the court is not authorized to find such design when it is just as reasonable to attribute the appearance of the ticket to accident as design. It is not doubted, as was argued here, that tickets may be marked as these were for the purpose of distinguishing them from other ballots, and to be furnished only to a certain class of voters. But in the absence of any proof tending to show this, the presumption must be that such impression was the result of accident, and not intended, and therefore within neither the letter nor spirit of this section, or section 1207 of the same Code, which provides that when a ballot bears upon it any impression, device, color or thing intended to designate or impart knowledge of the person who voted it, it must be rejected.

2. What is said in the preceding paragraph will apply with equal force to the two ballots not counted for appellant, one of which had upon its back a very small piece of red sealing wax, and the other a small stain, as if made by a drop of oil, or something of that nature. It is far more reasonable to suppose that the wax was accidentally placed upon the ticket by the officers of election in sealing the package in which it was returned than to believe that it was designedly placed there as a distinguishing mark before its deposit in the ballot-box; and as to the other, the mark or discoloration is of that character that the most natural conclusion in relation to it is that it was due to some accidental cause, and was not intended to distinguish the ballot or impart knowledge of the person who voted it.

3. The court erred in counting ballot marked "Exhibit 87" as a vote for the respondent. The ticket, so far as necessary to be set out, is as follows:

"18. Judge of the Superior Court, Thomas Rutledge.

"19. Judge of the Superior Court, J. W. Oates.

"20. State Senator, Tenth District, Robert Howe."

—with the name "Robert Howe" erased and that of the respondent written opposite, or in line with it. We do not see how this ticket can be read as a vote for respondent for the office of judge of the superior court. A ballot is to be construed as any other writing; and, while a resort to parol evidence of extrinsic circumstance may be had for the purpose of interpreting what would otherwise be doubtful, it cannot be shown that the intention of the voter was anything different from what plainly appears upon the face of the ballot. People v. Seaman, 5 Denio, 409.

And when the ballot intelligently shows that a particular person is voted for to fill a particular office, it cannot be counted differently because the court may believe that the voter made a mistake in preparing his ticket. Voting for a person to fill an office for which he is not a candidate may be the result of mistake, or it may be merely the frivolous exercise of the right of suffrage; but, no matter whether such action may be attributed to folly or mistake, the ballot is the only expression of the voter's will, and it must be counted according to its legal effect. The intention of the voter, as it appears upon the face of this ballot, was to vote for respondent for state senator, and not for judge of the superior court, and it should be so counted.

4. Upon certain ballots the printed name of the respondent was erased with an indelible pencil, and the name of the appellant written opposite thereto with the same kind of pencil. The court refused to count the same for appellant, but did count such ballots as votes for respondent. The respondent insists that the rulings of the court in relation to the counting of these ballots are justified by section 1204 of the Political Code. That section declares: "When upon a ballot found in any ballot-box a name has been erased and another substituted therefor, in any other manner than by the use of a lead-pencil or common writing ink, the substituted name must be rejected, and the name erased, if it can be ascertained from an inspection of the ballot, must be counted." There was evidence introduced tending to show that indelible pencils are not in fact lead-pencils, nor commonly known as such by merchants selling them. The question is thus presented whether a voter must follow the very letter of this section of the Code in preparing his ticket, or have his vote for a particular candidate rejected. We think it very clear that such is not the purpose or the meaning of that section. The Code commissioners, in their note to this section, say: "This section is intended to prevent the use of nitrate of silver, or any other chemical substance which may be written over a name and not be distinguishable until time brings out the impression; also, to prevent the use of pasters, the use of which is subject to two objections: first, their liability to come off; second, their liability to be fraudulently taken off." This object of the law—and it is apparent that the Legislature could have had no other in view—is attained if the erasure and substitution are made in such a manner as to present at the time and retain the same general appearance as if made by a lead-pencil or common writing ink. This section, in declaring that erasures and change of names shall not be made "in any other manner than by the use of a lead-pencil or common writing ink," really means that the erasure and substitution shall not be made in any other style or form, or with any different effect, than would be produced by the use of a lead-pencil or common writing ink. The law looks only to matters of substance, and does not waste its energies in pursuit of shadows; and if the appearance of having been made with a lead-pencil is produced by the use of an indelible pencil, there is a substantial compliance with the statute, although such a pencil may not, strictly speaking, be known as a lead-pencil. Any other construction would sacrifice the spirit and reason of the law to the mere letter; and yet it is one of the great maxims of interpretation to keep strictly in view the general scope, object and purpose of the law, rather than its mere letter. "He who considers merely the letter of an instrument goes but skin deep into its meaning," Broom, Legal Maxims, 611. "A rigid and literal meaning would, in many cases, defeat the very object of the Statute, and would 18 L. R. A.

exemplify the maxim that 'the letter killeth, while the spirit keepeth alive.' Every statute ought to be expounded, not according to the letter, but according to the meaning. . . . And the intention is to govern, although such construction may not in all respects agree with the letter of the Statute." Tracy v. Troy & B. R. Co. 38 N. Y. 487.

5. The court erred in counting ballot No. 8 as a vote for the respondent. Upon this ticket the printed name of respondent was erased with red ink, and that of J. W. Oates written in place of it, also in red ink. The respondent contends that red ink is not common ink within the meaning of the Statute. We cannot say that it is not such an ink; and its use is not within the mischief which it is the object of the law to prevent.

6. Upon several ballots the name of appellant was erased and no name substituted therefor, and the words "No vote" were not written after the name erased. These were counted as votes for appellant. The court was correct in this ruling. The Statute, in order to guard against fraudulent erasures, has provided this as the only way in which the voter can manifest his intention to erase a name, when he does not substitute another; and under such circumstances the erasure is not complete unless followed by these words. There is no valid constitutional objection to this requirement. It does not prescribe any educational qualification for the voter, nor require him to disclose the secrecy of his ballot, as contended.

7. The statement or complaint filed by appellant in this proceeding does not allege that he possesses the qualifications required by the Constitution of this State, to make him eligible to the office of judge of the superior court, and it is claimed by respondent that the statement is therefore fatally defective, and for that reason the judgment dismissing the proceeding should be affirmed. It is true that in order to entitle appellant to the full relief asked for, to wit, a judgment that he was elected instead of respondent, the statement should have alleged facts showing that he was eligible. But the statement is not fatally defective if it states a case for any relief. Perri v. Beaumont (Cal.) 27 Pac. Rep. 584. And we think that it does. It is alleged that the appellant is an elector of the County of Sonoma; and, such being the case, he was authorized to commence this proceeding, and upon proof of facts alleged in his statement, was entitled to a judgment annulling the election of defendant. As the case must be remanded for a new trial, the court below should, upon application, permit the appellant to amend his statement so as to allege the necessary facts showing his eligibility to be chosen to the office, the election to which is in controversy here. Perri v. Beaumont, supra.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

We concur: Beatty, Ch. J.; Garoutte, J.; Harrison, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Paterson, J.

UTAH SUPREME COURT.

John ROBINSON, Resp.,
v.
OREGON SHORT LINE & UTAH NORTH-ERN R. CO., App.

(.....Utah.....)

1. A common hand-car standing on the ground beside a railroad track is not a thing dangerous in and of itself, which a railroad company is required to guard or lock.
2. It is not negligence to leave a common hand-car, weighing from six hundred to seven hundred pounds, six feet from a railroad track and four or five feet below it, a mile from the thickly settled part of a city and a quarter of a mile from the nearest house, and let it remain there over Sunday, unlocked and unguarded so as to render its owners liable in damages for the death of a boy eleven years old, who, while riding on it with other boys who had replaced it on the track, fell off and was run over and killed.

(September 12, 1891.)

NOTE.—Trespass and unwarrantable interference in its relation to negligence.

It is difficult to see how a liability can be incurred where the defendant corporation had done nothing directly to produce the injury, and where there was an unauthorized interference with or invasion of its rights. It is true that cases may be found where a different doctrine seems to be upheld, as in Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, where an infant entered into a cart standing in the street and was injured, the owner was held liable. But there is a clear distinction between such a case, where the infant was lawfully in the highway, which it has the right to travel and use, and where the blameable carelessness of the defendant tempted the child to amuse himself with an empty cart and a deserted horse, and the case at bar where he is palpably invading the premises of another as a mere trespasser. In the latter case a party is without the protection of the law except in special cases. The owner of land may dig an excavation in his own premises, not substantially adjoining a public highway, and no action lies against him by one who has strayed off the highway and fallen into the excavation. Hardcastle v. South Yorkshire R. Co., 4 Hurlst. & N. 67; Hounsell v. Smith, 29 L. J. C. P. 206; Ilott v. Wilkes, 3 Barn. & Ald. 304; Nicholson v. Erie R. Co., 41 N. Y. 526.

But a different rule prevails when the pit dug is so near the highway that a person in using the same with ordinary caution may fall in. See Beck v. Carter, 68 N. Y. 233, where the authorities are reviewed.

Within well-recognized legal principles.

The deceased being a trespasser, defendant would not be liable for his death (Wharton, Neg. § 506; Kohn v. Lovett, 44 Ga. 251; Murray v. McLean, 57 Ill. 378; Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 6; Gillis v. Pennsylvania R. Co., 59 Pa. 129; and the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has asserted that an entry upon the land of an unfenced railroad company stood upon the same footing with an entry into a bedroom. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hummel, 44 Pa. 375. See New York & E. R. Co. v. Skinner, 49 Pa. 301.

In all cases, where a recovery has been sustained against a party not immediately connected with the 13 L. R. A.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Salt Lake County, in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death, and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Williams & Van Cott, for appellant:

If the instrument in and of itself is dangerous, then the defendant is liable in case it is left near a public place and young children are injured by reason of the same. Generally speaking, a machine dangerous in and of itself would be one that does injury when being tampered with in its then present condition and without changing its locality to an entirely different one so as to be most advantageous to do injury.

See Roddy v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 12 L. R. A. 749, 104 Mo. 234.

This principle of liability is the one recognized by the authorities.

Chicago & A. R. Co. v. McLaughlin, 47 Ill.

injury, the negligent act was in itself positively unlawful, or recklessly dangerous. Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Q. B. 29, has not been followed, nor is it regarded as authority. Hartfield v. Roper, 21 Wend. 615; Tonawanda R. Co. v. Munger, 5 Denio, 267, 4 N. Y. 360.

Effects of an act of negligence imminently dangerous.

Had the act of the defendant corporation been one imminently dangerous to the lives of others, the decision in the principal case would doubtless have been in favor of the plaintiff, within the principle of the familiar rule stated by Sutherland on Damages, vol. 2, p. 435: "Where an act of negligence is imminently dangerous to the lives of others the guilty party is liable to the one injured by the negligence, whether there be a contract between them violated by that negligence or not." The principle is illustrated by the case of Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397. That was a case in which a dealer in drugs had carelessly labeled a poison as harmless medicine, and sent it, so labeled, into the market. It was held that the dealer was liable to any person who might be injured by the use of the drug. In considering what articles can be regarded imminently dangerous, the same court, in Loop v. Litchfield, 42 N. Y. 357, says: "They are instruments and articles in their nature calculated to do injury to mankind, and are generally intended to accomplish that purpose; they are essentially and in their elements instruments of danger." Roddy v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 12 L. R. A. 748, 104 Mo. 234.

In Longmeil v. Holliday, 6 Eng. L. & Eq. 562, the distinction is recognized between an act of negligence imminently dangerous to the lives of others and one that is not so. In the former instance, the party guilty of the negligence is liable to the party injured; in the latter, the negligent party is liable only when his negligence is a breach of contract, express or implied.

It cannot reasonably be contended that a railroad car, though supplied with defective brakes, is an imminently dangerous instrument. Unless put in motion it is perfectly harmless, and when in motion it is not essentially dangerous. Roddy v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 12 L. R. A. 748, 104 Mo. 234; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. McLaughlin, 47 Ill. 235; Gurley v. Missouri Pac. R. Co., 12 West. Rep. 330, 93 Mo. 445.

The boys in this case were trespassers. They were not upon the public street or sidewalk or upon their own premises, but they went way off to a place where they would clearly become trespassers by going upon the appellant's property where the appellant would owe them no duty, so that the sole question would be brought home. Was a car of this kind down by the side of the track, not in a public place and not dangerous of itself, such an instrument that the appellant was bound to anticipate that boys could lift the same upon the track and be injured in consequence thereof?

See McEachern v. Boston & M. R. Co. 150 Mass. 515, and cases cited; Daniels v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (Mass.) ante, p. 248.

The son of the respondent was guilty of contributory negligence in the premises. An infant is held to care according to his age and understanding. Appellant should not be charged with greater care in looking after a boy of this age than he would be capable of exercising towards himself.

Messrs. Sutherland & Judd for respondent.

Anderson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action is brought by the plaintiff to recover damages for the death of his son, aged between eleven and twelve years, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. There was a verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff for $4,000, and the defendant brings this appeal from the judgment, and from the order of the court overruling a motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleged that on October 11, 1890, the defendant left a hand-car upon one of the tracks of its road within the limits of Salt Lake City, and permitted it to remain there until the evening of October 12, without being in any way guarded or locked, and that on the last-named date plaintiff's son was attracted to the hand-car, and got on the same with other boys, and while riding down a grade lost his balance, and fell from the car and was killed. The answer of the defendant denied each and every allegation of the complaint. The evidence showed that the defendant was constructing yards and side tracks near the north limits of Salt Lake City. That on Saturday, October 11, 1890, there was a set of hands at work there, and that about noon of that day they quit work, and started back to the city on a hand-car; that on account of snow having fallen on the rails, and an ascending grade, they were unable to propel the car; that they set the car off the track, left it unlocked, and came back to the city on foot; that the car weighed between six and seven hundred pounds and required four men to lift it from the track, that at the point where they put the hand-car off the track the track is four or five feet above the level of the ground, and they placed it so that the edge of the car would be about six feet from the rail; that the place where they left the car is about a mile from the thickly settled portions of the city, and that there are no houses nearer than a quarter of a mile, and that the ground is swampy and wet, and is not used nor suitable for a play-ground for children; that either that afternoon or on Sunday morning some boys placed the car back on the track. On Sunday forenoon a number of boys were playing with the hand-car by running around on the side tracks or switches, and about 3 o'clock in the afternoon they were joined by plaintiff's son and other boys, when they pushed the car up an ascending grade, and all got on, and started down the grade, and when a high rate of speed had been attained the son of plaintiff either jumped or fell off in front of the car, and was run over and killed. Some of the plaintiff's witnesses who were on the car at the time of the accident testified that the deceased jumped off, while others say they thought he lost his balance, and fell off. The ages of the boys, as far as it appears in the evidence, ranged from eleven to fifteen years. In the opinion of the witnesses the car was running at the time of the accident at a rate of twenty-five miles an hour, and the distance within which they stopped it, according to the testimony, was from ten to seventy-five feet from where the accident happened. James Morris, a witness for plaintiff, testified that he was fifteen years old; that he was one of the boys on the car when Robinson was killed; that after the accident they took the car off the track; and left it where the other boys told him they got it. He further testified that he, with other boys, had used the car before, with the permission of the "boss," eight or ten times, when the men were there working; but the boss never gave them permission to take the cars and ride on them when the men were not there.

The defendant contends that no negligence on its part was shown, and that the evidence is not sufficient to support the verdict. A hand-car, weighing six or seven hundred pounds, standing on the ground a quarter of a mile outside the settled limits of the city, is not of itself dangerous; and boys of sufficient age and strength to lift it up an embankment four or five feet high and place it upon the track are old enough to fully understand and appreciate whatever danger there is in running upon the track. The deceased and the other boys had no right to be upon the defendant's track meddling with its property. They were technically trespassers, and the defendant owed them no duty, as in the case of passengers or employes. If the boys who took this car and placed it on the track had found a common wagon standing beside the road and had hauled it to the top of a hill, removed or raised the tongue, and all gotten in and let it run down the hill at such a reckless rate of speed as to cause one of their number to become so alarmed as to jump or fall out and get killed; or if they had gone on a neighbor's premises without permission, and while there had taken a sled belonging to him, and engaged in the amusement called "coasting," and while so engaged one of them had fallen off and been run over and killed,—it would scarcely be contended that the owner of the wagon or sled would be liable in damages for the injury; and yet in principle those cases would differ but little, if any, from the one under consideration.

The case of Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 84 U. S. 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745, cited by plaintiff, was a case where a turn-table was left unfastened, and a small child was injured while it was being turned around. The court charged the jury in that case that, "if the turn-table in question, in its construction and the manner in which it was left, was not dangerous in its nature, the defendants were not liable for negligence;" and this instruction was approved by the Supreme Court of the United States. A machine, to be dangerous in and of itself, must be of such a character that it can only be handled with safety by persons of mature years and experience. But we think a common hand-car, standing on the ground beside a railroad track, is not a thing dangerous in and of itself, which the railroad company is required to guard or lock. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. McLaughlin, 47 Ill. 365; Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Stumps, 69 Ill. 414.

We think that to leave the hand-car where it was left in this case, under the circumstances, was not negligence, and that the verdict is unsupported by the evidence.

The cause is reversed and remanded, and a new trial ordered.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

FAIRFIELD COUNTY BAR, ex rel. Samuel FESSENDEN et al.,

v.

Howard W. TAYLOR, Appt.

(.....Conn.....)

1. Attorneys preferring charges against another attorney of unprofessional conduct, for the purpose of having him disbarred, need not show that they constitute a committee appointed by the bar association of the county for that purpose either to establish their right to institute the proceeding, or to give the court jurisdiction.

2. The record in an action against an attorney to recover money out of which he was charged with defrauding plaintiff, which resulted in a judgment against him, is admissible in a proceeding by members of the bar, based on the transaction out of which such action arose, to procure his disbarment for unprofessional conduct, especially where the complaint averred the existence of such record, which the answer denied.

3. The absolute disbarment of an attorney is justified where he, upon receiving an unenforceable claim against his own client, caused a complaint to be served in the name of another attorney and then advised his client to settle, falsely telling him, with full knowledge of the facts, that the claim was good and could be collected out of his property.

(January 7, 1891.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Fairfield County disbarring him from practice as an attorney. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. S. Sanford for appellant.

Messrs. Samuel Fessenden, John C. Chamberlain and George W. Wheeler, for appellees:

The courts have been steadfast in their pro-

NOTE.—Disbarment of attorneys.

An attorney is an officer of the court admitted to practice under its rules, amenable to it, and liable to have such relations sundered upon satisfactory evidence of dishonest professional conduct, habits of general immorality, or any such single act of crime or vice as may show him unfitted for the trusts and confidence reposed in him as such. Percy's Case, 36 N. Y. 651; Hawk, P. C. 212; Bryant's Case, 24 N. H. 155; Ex parte Brounsall, 2 Cowp. 829; 12 Geo. I. chap. 29; 4 Henry IV. chap. 18; Case of Austin, 5 Rawle, 204; Com. v. District Ct. Judges of Phila. 5 Watts & S. 272; Dicken's Case, 67 Pa. 189; Mill's Case, 1 Mich. 382.

He has a right to an opportunity to appear and answer in his own behalf before a final judgment against him; but any notice, rule, or summons does not require the technical nicety in its allegations, nor the exactness of proof, of a criminal proceeding. Penobscot County Bar v. Kimball, 64 Me. 140; Leigh's Case, 1 Munf. 481.

It is an inherent power with every court to disbar an attorney for unprofessional conduct, and in a series of decisions the following reasons have been assigned: ignorance of the law (Bryant's Case, 24 N. H. 149); drawing check on a bank in which the attorney had no deposit (Bank of New York v. Stryker, 1 Wheel. C. C. 380); improperly disclosing information received (People v. Barker, 56 Ill. 299); false representations in the form of affidavits by which the court was induced improvidently to grant an order (Re Houghton, 67 Cal. 511); grossly abusive language to or in the presence of the presiding judge (2 Dowl. Pr. 110); for unfaithful conduct as the trustee of an express trust acting under the appointment of the court. People v. Appleton, 105 Ill. 474.

In proceedings to disbar an attorney he can only be convicted on evidence good at common law, delivered, if he chooses, in his presence, by witnesses subject to cross-examination. Re an Attorney, 83 N. Y. 164.

Where an attorney employed by a husband to bring a divorce suit enters into collusion with the wife to manufacture evidence, which if not wholly untrue is deceptive, and thus to enable the husband to procure a divorce, this is an act of professional misconduct which authorizes an order disbarring the attorney. Re Gale, 75 N. Y. 533.

Where, after the examination of the evidence, it is evident, in view of the respondent's positive denial and explanation, that the evidence is not sufficient to justify his degradation and punishment, and where it further appears that the proceeding was penal in its nature, a motion to disbar should be dismissed. Re an Attorney, 1 Hun, 321.

Under a very recent decision by the supreme court of the State of New York, it appears that while by a special statutory enactment attorneys and counselors are declared to be judicial offitection of the integrity of the bar, and have uniformly held that gross violation of the confidence of a client is good ground for disbarment.

In the absence of specific provision to the contrary, the power of removal is commensurate with the power of appointment.

Penobscot County Bar v. Kimball, 64 Me. 147; Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 378, 18 L. ed. 370; Re Austin, 5 Rawle, 208.

Andrews, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellant was an attorney-at-law residing at Danbury, and practicing in Fairfield County. He was displaced from being an attorney by an order of the superior court in that county made on the 13th day of May, 1890. From that order he has appealed to this court. Section 784 of the General Statutes provides as follows: "The superior court may admit and cause to be sworn as attorneys such persons as are qualified therefor, agreeably to the rules established by the judges of said court; and no other person than an attorney so admitted shall plead at the bar of any court in this State, except in his own cause; and said judges may establish rules relative to the admission, qualifications, practice, and removal of attorneys." Section 785 provides that "attorneys admitted by the superior court shall be attorneys of all courts, and shall be subject to the rules and orders of the courts before which they act, which may fine them for transgressing any such rule or order, not exceeding one hundred dollars for any offense, and may suspend or displace them for just cause." As is seen from these sections, the superior court alone has power to admit persons to be attorneys-at-law, and the persons so admitted are attorneys in all the courts of the State. Any other court than the superior court may fine an attorney for transgressing its rules, and doubtless has the power to forbid him from appearing before it; but only the superior court can make an order of total suspension or displacement. In the absence of specific provisions to the contrary, the power of removal is, from its nature, commensurate with the power of appointment. There is no statute authorizing an appeal from an order by the superior court suspending or displacing an attorney; nor, so far as we are able to learn, is there any usage permitting it. Such orders have been made many times in the superior court, and this is the first instance in which any attempt has been made to take an appeal from one of them to the court of errors. Such an order, although it is a judicial act, has in it so much that is of a discretionary nature as to suggest great difficulties in an appeal. It is a discretion, too, that ought to be exercised with great moderation and care. But sometimes it must be exercised, and no other tribunal can decide in a case of removal from the bar with the same measure of information as the court itself. A revising tribunal, if there be such a one, would feel the delicacy of interposing its authority, and do so only in a plain case. In this case all objection to the appeal is expressly waived, and apparently with the approval of the judge of the superior court who made the order. We have therefore concluded to examine it.

The case is this: Certain attorneys practicing in Fairfield County, describing themselves to be a committee of the bar of that county, made a presentment to the superior court in that county, in the form of a complaint, therein charging the appellant with fraud and with other unprofessional conduct; and that he had been sued by Margaret and David Sprague, who claimed to have been his clients, and that in a matter concerning which they had asked and followed his professional advice he had defrauded them out of a large sum of money; that a trial had been had before the superior court in that county at a former session, and a which unfits him for association with the fair and honorable men of the profession, such unfitness, the result of habitual practices, may be made the subject of inquiry by the court and expulsion from the bar. But an act merely discreditable, but not infamous, while it would lose a member of the bar the favor and countenance of the high-minded men of the profession, cannot of itself give jurisdiction to the court to take judicial cognizance of it, and expel him from his office. Dickens' Case, 67 Pa. 168, 5 Am. Rep. 420.

The power to disbar an attorney is possessed by all courts which have authority to admit attorneys to practice. But it is a power which should only be exercised for the most weighty reasons, such as would render the continuance of the attorney in practice incompatible with a proper respect of the court for itself, or a proper regard for the integrity of the profession. And it has been said that a removal from the bar should never be decreed where any punishment less severe—such as reprimand, temporary suspension, or fine—would accomplish the end desired. See Bradley v. Fisher, 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 335, 20 L. ed. 648; Ex parte Garland, 71 U. S. 4 Wall. 383, 18 L. ed. 386; Ex parte Burr, 22 U. S. 9 Wheat. 529, 6 L. ed. 152; 1 Wait, Act. & Def. 473.

It is well settled that attorneys and counselors-at-law should be classified and designated as judicial officers. They are subject at all times to removal or suspension for a just cause shown, and when charged with deceit, malpractice, or misdemeanor, they should be given an opportunity to defend. The office of attorney and counselor becomes vacant upon the conviction of the incumbent of an infamous crime. Re Niles, 48 How. Pr. 246.

The doctrine of Austin's Case, 5 Rawle, 191, is, that the power of the court may be exercised against attorneys-at-law, either for a contempt which is an offense against the court itself, or for unfitness which disqualifies the attorney from filling the office properly. If an attorney should, by a series of unprofessional acts, form a character judgment rendered in favor of the said Spragues to recover of the appellant the sum of $2,288.75 for such fraud. A copy of the entire record in that case, the complaint, pleadings, finding of facts, and judgment, was attached to and made a part of the presentment so made by them. Upon that presentment the superior court made an order of notice to the appellant, requiring him to appear on a day named to make answer thereto. On the day so named the appellant did appear with counsel, made an answer denying all the material allegations of the presentment, and was fully heard. At the hearing the attorneys who had preferred the charges appeared to prosecute them. They offered a duly certified copy of the record, a copy of which had been set out in and made a part of their charges, and also the testimony of witnesses to prove the charges they had made, and also the truth of the things averred in the complaint of the said Daniel and Margaret Sprague. The appellant was also fully heard in his exculpation. All the evidence he offered was received without objection, and the matter was argued at length in his behalf by counsel. The court made a finding of facts, and rendered a judgment that the appellant be disbarred and forever prohibited from practicing law before the courts of this State.

At the commencement of the hearing the committee who had made the charges proposed to offer evidence of their appointment as a committee of the Bar, and for that purpose had the records of the Bar in court, and so stated. The court ruled that such evidence was not required, but that the court would recognize the persons named, they being known to the court as members of the Bar, as proper persons to prefer the charges and to present the matter therein contained to the court. This ruling was objected to, and is the first reason of appeal. There is no force to the objection. While it would have been well enough, perhaps, to have received that record, it would have been wholly without significance. It was the duty of the attorneys, if they knew of unprofessional conduct by the appellant or any other attorney, to bring it to the attention of the court. An appointment by the Bar to do that which it was their duty to do without any appointment could give them no added authority. Nor was any such appointment necessary to give the court jurisdiction. The court might summon the appellant to a hearing upon any information it had that it deemed worthy of credit, whether it came from lawyers or laymen. The manner in which the proceeding should be conducted, so that it be without oppression or injustice was for the court itself. Ex parte Wall, 107 U. S. 265, 27 L. ed. 552.

The appellant also objected to the record of the case brought by Daniel and Margaret Sprague against him being read, and further objected to the finding of the facts therein as not being a part of the record. It is to be observed that the finding of the facts in that case is made a part of the record by the order of the judge who heard the cause. There has been among the statutes of the State ever since 1864 a provision that a finding of facts may be made a part of the record by such an order. Acts 1864, chap. 49, p. 67. This provision may be found in the Revision of 1875, at page 444, § 9. It is in substance reproduced in the Practice Act (Acts 1879, p. 489, § 30), and is now section 1111 of the General Statutes of 1888. The objection to the record as a whole is that it was between other parties,—res inter alios acta. This objection has in it a tinge of sophistry. It turns aside from the purposes for which the hearing was had. It was an investigation by the court into the conduct of one of its own officers, not the trial of an action or suit. Neither the whole Bar of Fairfield County nor its committee were parties to an action in any proper sense. They were not prosecuting any matter of their own. They were not plaintiffs. They were performing their sworn duty to the court by bringing to its knowledge the misdoings of one of its agents. But if that committee be regarded as a party, and applying the strictest technical rule, the record was admissible. One of the averments of the complaint was the existence of a certain record. That averment was denied. On such an issue the plaintiffs might surely offer the best possible evidence there could be of the truth of their allegations. The existence of such a record as was averred in the complaint was proved by the production of a copy. For that purpose the whole record was admissible. And it does not appear to have been offered or used for any other purpose. The court seems to have been careful to limit it to its proper effect. All the other parts of the case were proved by other and appropriate evidence.

It is true that the charges contained in the present complaint are substantially the same as those contained in the Sprague complaint. They go over the same ground, and their truth or falsity was involved in this investigation. To prove them the evidence of witnesses was offered and received, and the finding of the court in this case is based exclusively on their testimony. But these charges did not contain the whole issue. The ultimate question lay beyond them. The real question was whether or not the appellant was a fit person to be longer allowed the privileges of being an attorney. And on that question the fact of the existence of such a record would be legitimate and cogent evidence.

The last reason of appeal is that the court erred in rendering a judgment of disbarment, instead of suspension only for a reasonable and stated period. Examined somewhat more in detail, the record shows that prior to January, 1886, the appellant had had such professional relations with Margaret and Daniel Sprague that he believed they would come to him for professional advice and assistance if they should have any law business. In that month he engaged to collect a judgment rendered in the Supreme Court in Dutchess County, in the State of New York, against the said Daniel Sprague, and owned by one Emeline Kent, for the amount of $1,849.82, with interest thereon from and after 1874. The appellant was authorized to settle for $1,000 net to the owner of the judgment, and was to receive for his own services all he could obtain over $1,000, up to $1,500, and one third of the amount collected in excess of the latter sum. Daniel and Margaret Sprague were husband and wife. Daniel had no property; Margaret had some property. In order to deceive the Spragues, and to cause them to believe, if they should come to him for advice or assistance, that he was not employed to collect the judgment, the appellant drew up and caused to be issued by another attorney a complaint against Daniel and Margaret Sprague in favor of the said Emeline Kent, to recover the amount due on the judgment. Upon this complaint the property of Margaret Sprague was attached. As soon as it was served the Spragues came to the appellant, and retained him as their counsel. He accepted that employment. He went to Dutchess County, and there learned that Margaret Sprague was not liable on the judgment. On his return he falsely stated to Mr. and Mrs. Sprague that she was liable on it, and that her property could be taken for it in the suit that had been served on them, and advised them to settle that suit on the most favorable terms they could. Relying on that advice they did settle, the said Margaret paying of her own money the sum of $1,875 in settlement, of which sum the appellant received the stipulated proportion. The appellant knew that from the time of her employment of him as aforesaid until the settlement of the suit the said Margaret relied upon him as her counsel, and believed him to be acting solely in her interest and behalf. He was, however, at that time acting for and in behalf of said Emeline Kent, plaintiff in the suit, which the Spragues did not know. It is hardly possible to characterize such conduct by an attorney-at-law in measured terms. That it was a gross violation of the attorney's oath is only a moderate statement. That it manifested a low condition of moral sensibility is true, and that it showed the appellant to be utterly wanting in the qualities which would entitle him to public confidence is also true. It is not enough for an attorney that he be honest. He must be that, and more. He must be believed to be honest. It is absolutely essential to the usefulness of an attorney that he be entitled to the confidence of the community wherein he practices. If he so conducts himself in his profession that he does not deserve that confidence, he is no longer an aid to the court nor a safe guide to his clients. A lawyer needs, indeed, to be learned. It would be well if he could be learned in all the learning of the schools. There is nothing to which the wit of man has been turned that may not become the subject of his inquiries. Then, of course, he must be specially skilled in the books and rules of his own profession. And he must have prudence, and tact to use his learning, and foresight, and industry, and courage. But all these may exist in a moderate degree, and yet he may be a creditable and useful member of the profession, so long as the practice is to him a clean and honest function. But possessing all these great faculties, if once the practice becomes to him a mere "brawl for hire," or a system of legalized plunder where craft and not conscience is the rule, and where falsehood and not truth is the means by which to gain his ends, then he has forfeited all right to be an officer in any court of justice, or to be numbered among the members of an honorable profession.

There is no error in the judgment complained of.

The other Judges concurred.

v.

Jacob MICHELS, Appt.

(.....Mich.....)

1. The price fixed by a combination of manufacturers with sole reference to their own interests will not govern in determining what a purchaser from one of them should pay for goods which he ordered and received, without any agreement as to price.

2. Argumentative comment on the evidence in the charge to the jury, the obvious tendency of which is to convey the Judge's impression regarding the testimony and to give direction to the verdict, is erroneous.

(October 16, 1891.)

NOTE.—Nature of monopolies; price fixed by an illegal combination is void.

A monopoly is a menace to the public. Its object and direct tendency are to prevent free and fair competition, and control prices throughout the national domain. It is no answer to say that it has in fact reduced the prices. That policy may have been necessary to crush competition. The fact exists that it rests in the discretion of a combination to raise the price to an exorbitant degree. Such combinations have frequently been condemned by courts as unlawful, and against public policy. Alger v. Thacher, 19 Pick. 51; Stanton v. Allen, 5 Denio, 434; Central Ohio Salt Co. v. Guthrie, 85 Ohio St. 672; Hooker v. Vandewater, 4 Denio, 349; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 188; Craft v. McConoughy, 79 Ill. 346; Hannah v. Fife, 27 Mich. 172.

Such a combination to effect such a purpose is inimical to the interests of the public, and all contracts designed to effect such an end are contrary 18 L. R. A.

to public policy, and therefore illegal. This is too well settled by adjudicated cases to be questioned at this day. People v. Fisher, 14 Wend. 9; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 178; Saratoga County Bank v. King, 44 N. Y. 87.

Modern adjudications have declared that all agreements tending to monopoly, or restraint of trade, or that have for their primary intent the destruction of competitive business and a consequent increase of price in the market value of commodities, are injurious to the commercial interests of the country, are contrary to public policy, and therefore void. Anderson v. Jett, 89 Ky. —; Arnot v. Pittston & E. Coal Co. 68 N. Y. 569; Hooker v. Vandewater, 4 Denio, 349; People v. Chicago G. Trust Co. 41 Alb. L. J. 68; Leonard v. Poole, 4 L. R. A. 723, 114 N. ERROR to the Circuit Court for Wayne County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to recover the value of certain knives, which had been sold and delivered to defendant without any agreement as to price, in which defendant claimed that the price charged and recovered was too high. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Conely, Maybury & Lucking, for appellant:

The court erred in that it clearly and distinctly indicated to the jury its opinion of the facts of the case, and the verdict which it thought ought to be rendered, and in making an attack upon the credibility of the defendant.

It was error to charge the jury: "It is a question of fact, to be determined from what took place between these men, whether the association was unlawful or not."

The indisputable facts were such that any disinterested person would at once pronounce the association an institution having for its sole end, aim, and object the crushing out of competition and the maintaining of prices.

In Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co., 68 Pa. 173, five coal companies entered into an agreement to divide two coal regions of which they had the control, to appoint a committee to take charge of their interests, which was to decide all questions, and appoint a general agent, through whom the coal mined was to be delivered. Each corporation was to deliver its proportion at its own cost in the different markets at such time and to such persons as the committee might direct; and the committee was empowered to adjust prices and freights and enter into agreements with other companies, by which the companies might sell their coal themselves only to the extent of their proportion, and at prices adjusted by the committee, and the agent to suspend shipments by either, beyond their proportion, the prices to be averaged and payments made to those in arrear by those in excess, and neither to sell coal otherwise than as agreed upon. This agreement was held by the court to be void, and incapable of being carried into effect. It was held to contemplate a business arrangement injurious to trade and commerce, and for that reason incapable of being legally supported. See People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. 5 L. R. Market price, how determined.

The market price of a merchantable commodity may be determined as well by offers to sell, made by dealers in the ordinary course of business, as by actual sale, and statements of dealers in answer to inquiries as to price are competent evidence. Harison v. Glover, 72 N. Y. 451.

The meaning of "market price," of "value of an article," is the price at which such articles are sold and purchased, clear of every charge but such as is laid upon it at the time of sale. This is the general meaning of the expression. Goodwin v. United States, 2 Wash. C. C. 493.

The "actual market value" is the price which the owner or producer of the goods is willing to receive for them, if they are sold in the ordinary course of trade—the prices which the purchaser must pay to get them. Re 8109 Cases of Champagne, 1 Ben. 241.

In Lush v. Druse, 4 Wend. 314, the witness, who testified as to the market price, had inquired of merchants dealing in the article, and examined their books, thus giving the source of his knowledge.

In Blydenburgh v. Welsh, Baldw. 381, 340, it was said: "To make a market there must be buying and selling, purchase and sale. If the owner of an article holds it at a price which nobody will give for it, can that be said to be its market price? Men sometimes put fantastical prices upon their property."

In Trout v. Kennedy, 47 Pa. 308, Strong, J., said: "If at any particular time there be no market demand for an article, it is not, of course, on that account of no value."

In James v. Muir, 38 Mich. 223, 227, Campbell, J., said: "In the present case it is sufficient to say that according to Acobal v. Levy [10 Bing. 376] there is, at least, no implication of a promise to pay at what may happen to be the market rate, which may not be always as there held, a reasonable rate." 1 Benjamin, Sales, Corbin's ed. § 86, note.

An offer to purchase may be some evidence of price. Hotchkiss v. Germania F. Ins. Co. 5 Hun, 90; Terry v. McNiel, 58 Barb. 241; Whelan v. Lynch, 60 N. Y. 489, 474.

A price-list, stating the price at which a manufacturer will sell, or statements of dealers in answer to inquiries, is competent evidence of the market-price of a marketable commodity, and is a common way of ascertaining or establishing a market-price. Lush v. Druse, 4 Wend. 314; Cluquot's Champagne, 70 U. S. 3 Wall. 114, 18 L. ed. 116.

If nothing has been said as to price, when a commodity is sold, the law implies an understanding that it is to be paid for at what it is reasonably worth; and where there is a conflict in the evidence as to the price agreed upon, the real value of the article may be shown. 1 Benjamin, Sales, Kerr's ed. § 90; Hillenbrand v. Wittkemper, 79 Ind. 180; Johnson v. Harder, 45 Iowa, 677; Norris v. Spofford, 127 Mass. 85; Brewer v. Housatonic R. Co. 107 Mass. 277; Saunders v. Clark, 106 Mass. 331; Parker v. Coburn, 10 Allen, 82; Rennell v. Kimball, 5 Allen, 366; Bradbury v. Dwight, 3 Met. 31.

A market value signifies a price established by public sales, or sales in the way of ordinary business, as of merchandise. Murray v. Stanton, 90 Mass. 345.

F. S. R.

In case the jury found the association to be unlawful, and the price to be fixed arbitrarily by them, then in arriving at the true market value, they might consider all the evidence in the case, including the market value, both before and after the time in question, and all other items of information as to value which were admitted in evidence.

2 Sutherland, Dam. 374.

Messrs. Bowen, Douglas & Whiting, for appellee.

McGrath, J., delivered the following opinion:

Defendant is a manufacturer of machines for cutting hoops, in which certain knives are used. He had dealt in the same knives for eight years, and bought from White Bros., of Buffalo, N. Y. One of the plaintiffs called upon defendant in September, 1888, soliciting orders for knives. Prices were talked over, and defendant claimed that he exhibited to plaintiff bills of knives which defendant had purchased from White Bros., and plaintiff said: "We will furnish you them at the same price you pay White Bros., and give you a better knife." The bills show the price per set to be $58.28. Defendant gave no order at that time. In November following defendant ordered by letter, from plaintiffs, two sets of hoop knives. Nothing was said about prices in the order. Plaintiffs booked the orders, and the goods were shipped, one set November 30, and the other December 5. Defendant testified that he was in a hurry for the knives, and that the bills came several days after the knives were received; that when he received the knives the machines were waiting for them, and his customers were waiting for the machines. The sole controversy in the case is as to the price which defendant shall pay for these knives. Plaintiffs claim $72.86 per set, and defendant admits an indebtedness of $58.28 per set. Plaintiffs admit that they were members of the Knife-Makers' Association; that this association at that time embraced all the knife-makers in the United States; that the prices charged by plaintiffs and sought to be collected were fixed by the association; that one of the principal objects of the association was to keep up prices; that the members of said association agree to sell at the prices fixed by the association, and that in case of any violation of such agreement, the member violating should forfeit $100; that the prices were subject to change without notice; that during the year 1888 there was a change made by the association, and twenty per cent added to the price. In answer to questions upon cross-examination, one of the defendant's witnesses said: "The Knife-Makers' Association was formed seven or eight years ago to keep up prices. In the early part of 1889 we [a new firm which had gone into the business in 1889, and was not in the association] cut 10 per cent on old prices, making 30 per cent off the list. Then later in the year the association cut 20 per cent on old prices, being 10 per cent below us. Then later on they cut 5 per cent more about holidays, and present prices were made early in 1890, making 45 per cent off the list. We followed to their figures."

Upon cross-examination of one of the plaintiffs, defendant's counsel sought to ascertain 18 L. R. A.

whether plaintiffs were governed in fixing prices by a printed schedule furnished by the association. Objection was made, and the court excluded the testimony, saying: "The only question is as to value; it don't make any difference how it was fixed. What could these knives be purchased for in the open market?" Counsel asked defendant when upon the stand what, in his judgment, was a fair market price for the knives in November, 1888, but the court excluded the testimony, saying: "Not what the fair market price was, but what the market price was,—what he could buy at from other manufacturers."

Defendant's counsel requested the court to charge the jury as follows: "(1) If you find that it was understood and agreed between Michels and Lovejoy, in September, 1888, that Lovejoy would make and furnish the knives to Michels at the same price as White had theretofore sold them, and that the order in question was given and accepted in pursuance of such agreement, then both parties are bound by it. (2) If no price was agreed upon, then plaintiff is entitled to recover the fair market value of the knives. (3) In arriving at such value, you are not bound by the price fixed by the Knife-Makers' Association. (4) The Knife-Makers' Association, under the evidence in this cause, was an unlawful combination for the purpose of fixing prices. (5) In arriving at the fair market value of the knives in question, you will consider all the evidence in the case, including the market value both before and after the time in question, and all other items of information as to the value, which have been admitted in evidence before you. (6) Even if plaintiffs could not have bought the goods elsewhere for less than the price fixed by plaintiffs, yet if you find from the evidence that such price was an arbitrary one, beyond the true value, temporarily maintained by an unlawful combination of manufacturers, then you are not bound by such price, but may fix the true market value from all the evidence in the case." These requests were refused.

The charge of the court contained the following: "Mr. Michels contends that he had some conversation with one of the plaintiffs in this case in September, when he was here, with reference to making certain knives, and he urges that his understanding at that time was that these knives should be made at the price that he had been paying for them heretofore, although there was nothing said with reference to these particular knives. Now, if there was any such understanding between Mr. Michels and the plaintiffs, why didn't he mention it in the letters that he wrote them after these goods were received? One of these letters was dated January 10, 1889, and it seems, from an inspection of these letters,—and they have been read to you,—that he make no reference whatever, in complaining of the price of these knives, that these knives were made by the plaintiffs for a price agreed upon in September. Now Mr. Lovejoy says that no such conversation ever took place as claimed by Mr. Michels. Mr. Michels says there was such a conversation. It is for you to determine whether there was or not. If there was, how does it happen that no reference to it was made in these letters to the plaintiff in January, 1890, after the receipt of these goods? Now, there is another thing as bearing upon this price. These goods were made and shipped to Mr. Michels, he claiming that they were, as he supposed, to be $58 a set; but it appears that there was an invoice sent with these goods at the time. Now, if the price was as contended by him, would he not, in the ordinary course of business, have made some complaint at once upon the receipt of these goods, seeing that they were charging for them 20 per cent more than he supposed he was to pay? This testimony in this case should be considered in all its bearings as determining the dispute between the parties. On the part of the defendant it is further contended that there was an unlawful combination between the manufacturers of such articles as these for the purpose of enhancing their price or putting their price beyond the real market value. If that is so, such a combination is unlawful, and the mere fact that the price is fixed in an arbitrary manner like that is not binding upon the jury in determining the real market value of the property. On the part of the plaintiff it is admitted that there was such an association or organization of the manufactures of knives or edge tools of this country; that they got together and put reasonable prices only upon their goods. Well, if that is a fact, then there would be nothing unlawful in such a combination as that. If they combine for the purpose of putting a fictitious value upon their goods, or for the purpose of driving small manufacturers out of the business by putting their goods down to a lower price than the market price, and below what they can be made for, and do this for the purpose of ruining such other manufacturers, such a combination is unlawful. It is a question of fact, to be determined from what took place between these men, whether the association was unlawful or not. The fact that there is an association would not justify the inference that it was unlawful or that it was formed for a purpose contrary to law. If without any reason they put an additional 20 per cent upon these knives, merely using this power that they had arbitrarily for the purpose of controlling the market, that would be unlawful on their part; but if, on the other hand, as it is claimed, there was a great risk connected in the making of these particular knives, and, on account of the nicety of the work required and the extreme risk, these manufacturers felt that it was just and right and proper, for the purpose of protecting themselves against loss, to fix a fair market price for this work, and they put this 20 per cent on it, I should say it was a legitimate act."

The trial judge heard and submitted the case upon the theory that a combination to fix prices was not unlawful if the purpose was to fix reasonable prices, and when defendant sought to show that the prices fixed were not fair market prices, and were above the market value, the court refused to permit him, and restricted him to the market price, when, as a matter of fact, the association embraced all the manufacturers, and the only "market price" was that fixed by the association.

In Richardson v. Buhl, 77 Mich. 682, 6 L. R. A. 457, this court held that any combination to control prices was unlawful, as against public policy. In the present case, as in that, it was claimed that the combination had in fact reduced prices, and upon that point the court says: "It is no answer to say that this monopoly has in fact reduced prices. That policy may have been necessary to crush competition. The fact exists that it rests in the discretion of the corporation at any time to raise the price to an exorbitant degree."

In the present case no price was agreed upon at the time the order was given, and there was no evidence tending to show that defendant had any knowledge of the price fixed by the association. An attempt is made to fasten a price fixed by a combination upon such a purchaser. It is sufficient to know that the price sought to be imposed is that fixed by the combination. If so, it was unlawfully fixed, and has no force as a market price, for that reason. It is the combination for the purpose of controlling prices that is unlawful, and the fact that they, the manufacturers, deemed the prices fixed to be reasonable, does not purge it of its unlawful character. Independently of the unlawful character of the combination fixing it, a price so fixed cannot be regarded as any better evidence of value than that fixed by any vendor upon his own wares. A price so fixed is not to be entitled to rank as the market price. It is not a market price, within the contemplation of the law. The market price of an article manufactured by a number of different persons is a price fixed by buyer and seller in an open market, in the usual and ordinary course of lawful trade and competition. It cannot be divested of these incidents, and retain its character. Associations of this character give the buyer no voice, and close the market against competition.

In Acebal v. Levy, 10 Bing. 376, cited in 1 Benjamin on Sales, 108, the court declared that, when there was no express contract as to price, the price is to be a reasonable price,—“such a price as the jury upon the trial of the cause shall, under all the circumstances, decide to be reasonable. The price may or may not agree with the current price of the commodity at the port of shipment at the precise time when such shipment is made. The current price of the day may be highly unreasonable from accidental circumstances, as on account of the commodity having been purposely kept back by the vendor himself, or with reference to the price at other ports in the immediate vicinity, or from various causes.”

In James v. Muir, 33 Mich. 223-227, Mr. Justice Campbell, speaking for the court, says: “According to Acebal v. Levy, there is at least no implication of a promise to pay at what may happen to be the market rate, which may not be always, as there held, a reasonable rate.”

In Kountz v. Kirkpatrick, 72 Pa. 376, the court says: “Ordinarily, when an article of sale is in the market, and has a market value, there is no difference between its market value and the market price, and the law adopts the latter as the proper evidence of the value. This is not, however, because ‘value’ and ‘price’ are really convertible terms, but only because they are ordinarily so in a fair market. The market price of an article is only a means of arriving at compensation; it is not itself the value of the article, but is the evidence of value. The law adopts it as a natural inference of fact, but not as a conclusive legal presumption. Without adding more, I think it is conclusively shown that what is called the 'market price' or the quotations of the articles for a given day is not always the only evidence of actual value, but that the true value may be drawn from other sources, when it is shown that the price for the particular day has been unnaturally inflated."

It has frequently been held that the value of a commodity is not to be determined by the necessities of a particular buyer or the demands of a particular seller. If the "current price" is not conclusive upon the purchaser, because the vendor may have by some act of his own made that price unreasonable, or if it may be shown that the market price had been unnaturally inflated, how can it be said that a price fixed by a combination of the manufacturers of a given article, with sole reference to their interests, is to govern, to the exclusion of all other considerations? In such case there is no market price, and evidence of a fair market price or a fair market value is clearly admissible. In the absence of an agreement, a price fixed by a combination of dealers does not bind the purchaser, nor will the law so far countenance such combinations as to regard prices fixed by them as even evidence of value.

The argumentative portion of the charge, relating to the letters written by defendant, was clearly erroneous. It could not fail to convey to the jury the impression formed by the trial judge regarding that testimony, and to give direction to their judgment. All inferences to be drawn from the testimony are exclusively for the jury, and not for the court. Richards v. Fuller, 38 Mich. 656; People v. Gastro, 75 Mich. 182, and cases cited. It is no part of the duty of the court to convince the jury as to matters of fact.

The judgment must be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to defendant.

Morse, J., concurred with McGrath, J.

Champlin, Ch. J., delivered the following opinion:

In executed contracts of sale upon credit, where the price is not agreed upon at the time of sale, the law implies an understanding to pay what the commodity is reasonably worth. 1 Benjamin, Sales, § 85, p. 102. In Acebal v. Lery, 10 Bing. 376, the declaration alleged that the plaintiff had sold to the defendants a cargo of nuts, at a certain value, namely, the then usual and common shipping price for nuts at the port where the cargo was shipped, and that in consideration thereof defendants undertook and faithfully promised to accept the said nuts, and pay the plaintiff for the same on delivery thereof to the defendants. The declaration then alleged that the usual and common shipping price and value of the nuts at the port of shipment was at a certain rate, naming it; and that they were ready to deliver, and offered to deliver, the nuts to the defendants, but they refused to accept. In deciding the case, Chief Justice Tindal said: "Whether, in all cases of executory contracts of purchase and sale, where the parties are altogether silent as to the price, the law will supply the want of any agreement as to the price by inferring that the parties must have intended to sell and to buy at a reasonable price, may be a question of some difficulty. Undoubtedly, the law makes that inference where the contract is executed by the acceptance of the goods by the defendant, in order to prevent the injustice of the defendant taking the goods without paying for them. But it may be questionable whether the same reason applies to a case where the contract is executory only, and where the goods are still in the possession or under the control of the seller." And he further says: "A contract to furnish a cargo at a reasonable price means such a price as the jury upon the trial of the case shall, under all the circumstances, decide to be reasonable. This price may or may not agree with the current price of the commodity at the port of shipment at the precise time when such shipment is made. The current price of the commodity may be highly unreasonable, from accidental circumstances, as on account of the commodity having been purposely kept back by the vendor himself, or with reference to the price at other ports in the immediate vicinity, or from various other causes."

This case is cited and approved in James v. Muir, 38 Mich. 228. The principle underlying the decision is that the vendor cannot be permitted, by withholding the commodity from market or otherwise, to fix the current price of the commodity, and thus fasten upon the purchaser an implied agreement to pay such price. If the plaintiffs in this suit, by combining with other manufacturers or dealers, can thus arbitrarily establish the current price of the commodity sold, and if the purchaser can be held to have impliedly promised or agreed to pay the price so established, it follows that he may be obliged to pay a highly unreasonable price. I do not think a price so fixed by a combination of manufacturers or dealers is competent evidence to show a reasonable price of goods sold by the members of such combination. Such combinations to control prices are intended to stifle competition, which is a stimulus of commercial transactions, and to substitute therefor the stimulus of unconscionable gain, whereby the participants in such combinations become enriched at the expense of the consumer, beyond what he ought legitimately to pay, under a healthy spirit of competition in the business community. The effect of such combinations to control prices is the same as that other class of contracts which has always been denounced as vicious, namely, contracts in restraint of trade. Public policy places its reprobation upon one equally with the other. These combinations to control prices are becoming very numerous, and affect, not only the staples of human sustenance, but nearly all the necessities of life and the necessities of business. Such combinations to control prices are against public policy, and void, on the ground that they have a mischievous tendency, so as to be injurious to the best interests of the State. The best interests of the State require that all legitimate business should be open to competition; that the current price of commodities should be controlled by the law of demand and supply; that the laws of commerce should flow in their accustomed channels, and should not be diverted by combinations to control prices fixed by the arbitrary decision of interested parties. Of course, what is said above does not apply to monopolies authorized by law; as, for instance, to patented articles. The odious features of illegal monopolies are plainly apparent. These can absolutely control the prices which the public shall pay, and it is this monopolistic feature of such combinations to control prices which stamps them as odious, because they exercise the franchises of the monopoly without the legal right. These views are supported in the following cases: Anderson v. Jett, 89 Ky. —; Cleveland, C. O. & I. R. Co. v. Closser, 126 Ind. 348, 9 L. R. A. 754; People v. North River Sugar Ref. Co. 54 Hun, 354, 5 L. R. A. 386; Richardson v. Buhl, 77 Mich. 632, 6 L. R. A. 457; Pittsburg Carbon Co. v. McMillin, 119 N. Y. 46, 7 L. R. A. 46; Stanton v. Allen, 5 Denio, 434; Morris Run Coal Co. v. Barclay Coal Co. 68 Pa. 173; Arnot v. Pittston & E. Coal Co. 68 N. Y. 558; Central Ohio Salt Co. v. Guthrie, 35 Ohio St. 666; India Bagging Assn. v. Kock, 14 La. Ann. 168; Denver & N. O. R. Co. v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 15 Fed. Rep. 650; Hilton v. Eckersley, 6 El. & Bl. 47; West Virginia Transp. Co. v. Ohio River P. L. Co. 22 W. Va. 600, 617; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. American U. Teleg. Co. 65 Ga. 160; Craft v. McConoughy, 79 Ill. 346; Raymond v. Leavitt, 46 Mich. 447; Faulds v. Yates, 57 Ill. 416; Wright v. Ryder, 36 Cal. 342.

I have no doubt that in executory contracts of sale, where the goods have not been accepted, such prices so fixed cannot be recovered; and I am also of opinion that such price so fixed is no criterion of the market value or current price in an action brought for goods sold and delivered, where no price has been agreed upon. In this case the goods have been ordered and accepted without any reference to the price to be paid. The law presumes that defendant intended to pay what the knives were reasonably worth. As pointed out in James v. Muir, 38 Mich. 223, the market value and the reasonable worth of a commodity are not always the same. Ordinarily the market value is evidence of what goods are reasonably worth. Kountz v. Kirkpatrick, 72 Pa. 376, 386; Benjamin, Sales, p. 103, § 86. If there be no market value of manufactured goods, the evidence to establish the reasonable worth must necessarily be the cost of production, which would include the cost of labor and material, and a reasonable profit on the cost of production. The testimony must be submitted to the jury, and it is their province to determine from such testimony the reasonable worth of such goods. It does not rest with the witnesses to swear what they are reasonably worth, but they may state the facts from which the jury may determine the reasonable worth. Nor can this court pass upon that question. It is one of fact, and not of law. Becker v. Hecker, 9 Ind. 497. Generally speaking, it is competent for a witness, after he has been shown to be qualified to express an opinion as to value of the thing in dispute, to state to the jury what his opinion as to value is. But such opinions are not absolutely binding upon the jury, but only as persuasive, and may be considered by them in arriving at their own conclusion. Thompson, Trials, § 380.

In order to pass upon the specific questions raised by the assignment of errors, it is necessary to specify with more particularity what the record shows. The declaration in this case was upon the common counts in assumpsit, and the bill of particulars for goods sold August 29, 1889. This, however, is not the true date of sale. The plea was the general issue, with notice of recoupment. On the trial in the circuit the plaintiffs claimed to recover $139.89 and interest. The defendant admitted the plaintiffs' claim to the amount of $116.06, less $6, under the plea of recoupment. Under the charge of the court the jury returned a verdict of $140.74, for which plaintiff had judgment. The sale of the goods was through a written order signed by defendant, and mailed to plaintiffs in November, 1888, for two sets (six knives) hoop knives, one half inch thick, to be so made that they will interchange one with the other. The plaintiffs are manufacturers of machine knives of all kinds, at Lowell, Mass. They received the order on November 30, and December 5, 1889, the knives were shipped to defendant and received by him. The defendant claims that they were not exactly according to the pattern furnished, and that he expended some $6 in fitting them. On the same day the goods were shipped a bill was forwarded to defendant charging him $72.86 per set for the knives, and 20 per cent extra for manufacturing so that they could be used as one knife, or $14.57 for this purpose. Thus the total bill for the two sets amounted to $174.86, from which the plaintiffs discounted 20 per cent to the trade, leaving a balance of $139.89, the amount they claimed due them. Elwin W. Lovejoy, one of the plaintiffs, testified that the plaintiffs charged the regular market price of $72 per set; that the price was $174.86 for the two sets, less discount to the trade of twenty per cent, making $139.89, which he testified was a reasonable charge, and was the market price for the knives, exactly such as would be charged by other dealers for the same knives; and that the goods were sold on thirty days' time. He also testified that the plaintiffs made the knives from a pattern furnished them before that time, along in the summer, by Michels. It appears from the testimony that plaintiffs are members of what is called the "Machine Knife Makers' Association," and at the time of the trial all the manufacturers of knives in the United States were members of that association, with the exception of the Anderson Knife & Bar Association, located at Anderson, Ind. But this association had not commenced the manufacture of knives at the time the goods in this case were sold. The association of which the plaintiffs were members was formed in 1882, for the purpose of keeping up the prices on the goods, and that such was its principal object was testified to by Lovejoy. Every member of the association is bound by agreement to maintain the prices fixed by the association, and there is a clause in the agreement that a man who does not sell at these prices shall forfeit $100. The plaintiffs agreed to sell at the regular prices fixed by the association. It further appears that the prices charged for the goods sold defendant are the regular prices fixed by the association, and the reason why the plaintiffs fixed these prices was because the association had before that fixed it at the same price.

These prices are fixed twice a year, in January and July, and the witness Lovejoy testified that he was one of the persons who assisted in fixing the prices. It also appears that in July, 1888, the association advanced the prices, as claimed by the witness, 20 per cent from what had been the prices prior thereto in 1887 and 1886, and that no notice of such advances had been given to their customers; that at former prices goods such as these sold to defendant had been sold at a fair profit. The prices for which they had been fixed prior to July, 1888, was $58.28 a set, this price having also been fixed by the association; and it further appears that there had not been 20 per cent difference in the cost of making knives. The association raised the price in July from $58.28 for knives such as those sold to defendant to $72.86, an increase of 25 per cent. The plaintiffs then added 20 per cent more because defendant ordered them to be made so as to be used interchangeably, or $14.57 each set, and then made a discount of 20 per cent on the whole amount to the trade. The defendant had purchased such knives in 1886 and 1887 of a firm in Buffalo, N. Y., who were members of the association, and had charged therefor the prices fixed by it, namely, $58.28 a set, and plaintiffs were aware that this price was fixed by the association. It was the theory of plaintiffs that the price fixed by the association was the market price, because that price was what all the members of the association sold the goods for; and they produced several witnesses to testify that the price sued for was the market price, but these witnesses were members of the association, and testified that they regarded the prices fixed by the association as the market price. No other criterion to ascertain the reasonable worth of the goods sold was given by the plaintiffs' witnesses.

The defendant's theory was, first, that he had agreed with plaintiffs, in an interview with Mr. Lovejoy a short time before he gave the order, that plaintiffs should furnish the knives for the same price that he had been paying to the Buffalo firm; that the inducement held out by Lovejoy was that plaintiffs would make him a better article. This was denied by Lovejoy. The defendant's contention, further, was that the agreement made by the association to fix the prices, to which all the members were bound, embracing, as it did, nearly the whole of the manufacturers of such goods in the United States, and the whole, with one exception, was an unlawful combination, entered into for the purpose of controlling prices of such goods, based, not upon the market value or upon what such goods were reasonably worth, but upon the arbitrary determination of the members for the purpose of profit, and such price so fixed was no evidence of what such goods were reasonably worth; that his liability could not extend beyond the reasonable worth of such goods; that the price charged for which plaintiffs sued and recovered was unreasonable; and, as relevant to this issue, he claimed the right to show by the plaintiffs' witness Lovejoy who had, with others, raised the price 20 per cent, and had testified that such price was reasonable, that in June, 1888, he was selling this same kind of goods for $58.28, and that the cost of production had not increased, and that in June plaintiffs regarded $58.28 as a reasonable price. I think, upon cross-examination of this witness, the defendant was entitled to inquire of him, "What was the price of these knives in June, 1888?" and that the court erred in excluding the answer. He also erred in not permitting the witness Lovejoy to answer this question: "Was there any increase in the cost of making these knives in November from what there was in June?"

Defendant's counsel requested the court to charge the jury as follows: "First. If you find that it was understood and agreed between Michels and Lovejoy in September, 1888, that Lovejoy would make and furnish the knives to Michels at the same price as White had theretofore sold them, and that the order in question was given and accepted in pursuance of such agreement, then both parties are bound by it." This request was given, but in language and with observations which counsel for defendant deemed subject to exception. The learned judge said: "Mr. Michels contends that he had some conversation with one of the plaintiffs in this case in September, when he was here, with reference to making certain knives, and he urges that his understanding at that time was that these knives should be made at the price that he had been paying for them heretofore, although there was nothing said with reference to these particular knives. Now, if there was any such understanding between Mr. Michels and the plaintiffs, why didn't he mention it in the letters that he wrote them after these goods were received? One of these letters was dated January 10, 1889, and it seems, from an inspection of these letters,—and they have been read to you,—that he made no reference whatever, in complaining of the price of these knives, that these knives were made by the plaintiffs for a price agreed upon in September. Now Mr. Lovejoy says that no such conversation ever took place as claimed by Mr. Michels. Mr. Michels says there was such a conversation. It is for you to determine whether there was or not. If there was, how does it happen that no reference to it was made in these letters to the plaintiffs in January, 1890, after the receipt of these goods? Now, there is another thing as bearing upon this price. These goods were made and shipped to Mr. Michels, he claiming that they were, as he supposed, to be $58 a set. But it appears that there was an invoice sent with these goods at the time. Now, if the price was as contended by him, would he not, in the ordinary course of business, have made some complaint at once upon the receipt of these goods, seeing that they were charging for them 20 per cent more than he was supposed to pay? This testimony in this case should be considered in all its bearings, as determining the dispute between the parties." We have had occasion heretofore to call attention to the impropriety of the trial judge calling the attention of the jury to a particular part of the testimony of a witness for comment, and everything that savors of argument had much better be left to the hired advocates of the parties. Some points in the testimony of a witness may strike a trial judge as inconsistent with disclosed facts, but there is danger of creating a prejudice against the witness, to the detriment of the rights of the parties, if the trial judge steps aside from instructions as to the law which governs a case to draw inferences from facts disclosed. It is exclusively within the province of the jury to draw such inferences. Everyone who reads this charge, and anyone hearing it given, must have been impressed with the idea that the trial judge did not believe the testimony of the defendant, Michels. He pointed out inferences which might be drawn by the jury which were apparently inconsistent with the idea of a contract. He failed to observe upon the testimony of the plaintiff, given upon his direct examination, that "we made the knives from a pattern furnished before that time, along in the summer, by Michels;" and the inference that might be drawn therefrom; and he might have added, with equal pertinency, Why, if there had been no contract or agreement previous to the written order, had Michels furnished plaintiffs with a pattern for the knives? I mention this for the purpose of showing the impropriety of attempting an argument to the jury by a judge upon the facts, unless it is argued fully for both sides. These witnesses were parties, and their testimony was conflicting, and their credit should have been left to the jury, without pointing out upon one side inferences which might tend to affect it. Williams v. Sheldon, 61 Mich. 815; Bulen v. Granger, 63 Mich. 311; People v. Finley, 38 Mich. 486; People v. Colerick, 67 Mich. 362; People v. Gastro, 75 Mich. 127; Kelly v. Emery, 75 Mich. 147.

The court further charged the jury as follows: "On the part of the defendant, it is further contended that there was an unlawful combination between the manufacturers of such articles as these, for the purpose of enhancing their price or putting their price beyond the real market value. If that is so, such a combination is unlawful, and the mere fact that the price is fixed in an arbitrary manner like that is not binding upon the jury in determining the real market value of the property. On the part of the plaintiff it is admitted that there was such an association or organization of the manufacturers of knives or edge-tools of this country; that they got together, and put reasonable prices only upon their goods. Well, if that is a fact, then there would be nothing unlawful in such a combination as that. If they combine for the purpose of putting a fictitious value upon their goods, or for the purpose of driving small manufacturers out of the business by putting their goods down to a lower price than the market price, and below what they can be made for, and do this for the purpose of ruining such other manufacturers, such a combination is unlawful. It is a question of fact, to be determined from what took place between these men, whether the association was unlawful or not. The fact that there is an association would not justify the inference that it was unlawful or that it was formed for a purpose contrary to law. If, without any reason, they put an additional 20 per cent upon these knives, merely using this power that they had arbitrarily for the purpose of controlling the market, that would be unlawful on their part; but if, on the other hand, as it is claimed, there was a great risk connected with the making of these particular knives, and on account of the nicety of the work required, and the extreme risk, these manufacturers felt that it was just and right and proper, for the purpose of protecting themselves against loss, to fix a fair market price for this work, and they put this 20 per cent on it, I should say it was a legitimate act." What I have said in the beginning of this opinion need not be repeated; much that is said in the instruction is a correct statement of the law, but testimony was ruled out that would have thrown light upon the question as to whether the purposes of the association are only "to put reasonable prices upon their goods." The testimony of the members of the association cannot be taken as undisputed or indisputable. On the contrary, the testimony in the case before referred to was sufficient, in my judgment, to condemn the object of this association as unlawful. The reasonableness of the prices must depend upon the cost of production, the cost of material used, the risks of the business, the labor of producing, the demand for the goods, and all those facts which tend to show the reasonable worth of the articles, and there can be no market value of the article where its current price is not affected by competition, but, on the other hand, competition is disarmed by combination, and the price is fixed arbitrarily by the sellers, to which all engaged in selling must conform. The judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

Grant, J., delivered the following opinion:

This suit is brought to recover the price of two sets of knives used in hoop-machines. Plaintiffs carried on their business in Lowell, Mass., while the defendant resided and did business in Detroit, Mich. Defendant sent a written order in November, 1888, without any reference to price. Defendant's counsel insist that these goods were ordered in reliance upon an agreement made in September previous between himself and plaintiff E. W. Lovejoy, who visited him in Detroit. Defendant's version of the conversation then had fails to establish an agreement. Mr. Lovejoy at that time solicited an order, but defendant told him he did not need any knives then, and made no promise to order any in the future.

1. This claim of defendant is based entirely upon the statement of defendant, which is that he showed Mr. Lovejoy some bills of knives purchased from White Bros., and that Lovejoy said: "We will furnish you them at the same price that you pay White Bros." This conversation was two months or more prior to the written order of defendant. There is not a scintilla of evidence tending to show any agreement, or even understanding, that defendant would order goods from plaintiffs in consequence of this statement or any other. Courts cannot manufacture contracts for parties out of such statements. Did defendant agree to buy? Did he agree to order? If he agreed to do either, when was the contract to be performed? Was this a standing offer to be accepted by defendant at any time in the future? Furthermore, defendant in his written order made no reference to this conversation, nor did he testify that he gave it, relying upon Lovejoy's statement. The court left it to the jury to determine whether this conversation constituted an agreement. The alleged erroneous instructions of the court upon this branch of the case become immaterial, for the finding of the jury was such as the court should have instructed them to find.

2. The price charged was $72.86 per set with 20 per cent extra. From the total bill a discount of 20 per cent was allowed, leaving the amount claimed $189.89. Defendant admitted his liability for all except the extra 20 per cent, amounting to $29.14. This price was fixed by the Machine Knife Makers' Association of the United States, of which plaintiffs were members, and which then embraced all the knife-makers in the United States. Under its rules, its members were required to charge association prices, under a penalty of $100 for neglect to do so. These knives were what were called "special knives," so made as to form in reality one knife. Evidence on the part of the plaintiff showed that greater care was required in their manufacture than in that of ordinary knives, and that the price charged afforded a reasonable profit. Defendant's counsel requested the court to instruct the jury that this combination was unlawful. This the court refused, but did instruct them that "an arbitrary price fixed by such an association was not binding upon them in determining the market value of the property, but that there was nothing unlawful in their combining and putting reasonable prices upon their goods; that the fact that there is an association would not justify the inference that it was unlawful, or that it was formed for a purpose contrary to law; that if, without any reason, they put an additional twenty per cent upon these knives, merely using this power that they had arbitrarily, for the purpose of controlling the market, that would be unlawful on their part; but if, as it is claimed, there was a great risk connected with the making of these particular knives, and on account of the nicety of the work required, and the extreme risk, these manufacturers felt that it was just and right and proper, for the purpose of protecting themselves against loss, to fix a fair market price for this work, and they put this twenty per cent on it, I should say it was a legitimate act."

Associations of manufacturers are not necessarily unlawful. The evidence does not show that the sole object of this association was to control prices. The association might be entirely lawful, while an arbitrary price fixed by it would not bind a purchaser who had not expressly agreed to pay it. The court would certainly have been justified, under the plaintiff's evidence, in instructing the jury that this 20 per cent so fixed by this association did not bind the defendant, and did not make a market price. But, in addition to the instruction I have above quoted, the court instructed the jury that the combination was unlawful, if formed for the purpose of enhancing the price, or putting it beyond the real market value. There was no evidence that the price was unreasonable, or afforded more than a fair profit. The only error in these instructions was in not informing the jury that as to this 20 per cent there was no evidence of a market value, for a combination cannot fix a price arbitrarily, and make it the market price, and that the only question for them was the reasonable worth of the knives. But the failure to so instruct the jury is not complained of. If the case made was one for a jury to determine the "fair" or "real" market value, I think the charge fairly submitted that question to the jury, and that no error, was committed in refusing to charge that the association was unlawful.

3. Did the court commit any errors in rejecting testimony offered by the defendant? The defendant was asked by his counsel to state the fair market value of these knives. The court rejected this testimony as incompetent, but limited the question to the market price. It is insisted that this ruling limited him to the price fixed by the association. The price of commodities bought and sold may be fixed in three ways: (1) by express agreement; (2) by the market; (3) by the actual value. It must be remembered that we are dealing with an executed contract, one of those daily commercial transactions between buyer and seller, where the one orders, and the other completes the transaction by delivering the goods. In such cases the price must be determined in one of the three ways above mentioned. If there be no express agreement and no market price, the contract then is to pay what the commodity is reasonably worth. As already shown, there was no express agreement as to price, and no market price. Therefore the only issue to be tried was, Was this additional 20 per cent reasonable, affording only a fair profit to the plaintiffs? A market price is the price fixed by fair and open competition in an open market, where sellers and buyers stand upon an equal footing. Legally the price so established is fair, and fixes the reasonable worth of the commodity. When the price is high, the purchaser may call it unfair; when the price is low, the seller may call it unfair; but in law both are fair, and, in the absence of any express agreement, seller and purchaser alike contract with reference to it. Upon no other basis can the great commercial transactions of the world be carried on. The immense granaries of this country are filled with products which represent labor, some of which has been remunerative, and others unremunerative, according to the character of the soil and the industry and management of the laborers and other conditions. If the market price of wheat reaches $1.25 to $1.50 per bushel, will a purchaser be permitted by the law to say to the farmer who sells: "That is not a fair market price; it allows you too much profit, and therefore is not binding upon me?" On the other hand, if the market price of the same commodity is so low as not to afford the farmer a reasonable profit, can he say to the purchaser of his grain: "The market is unfair, and affords me no profit, and therefore you must pay more." If there be a "fair market price," distinguishable in law from the "market price," then there is no such thing as a "market price," binding upon sellers and buyers, unless they contract with express reference to it; but it must be left to a jury in each case to determine what is the fair market value. The same rule must apply to manufactured commodities, the price of which is ordinarily fixed by such competition in an open market. But a price fixed by a combination of sellers or of buyers is not a market price, and binds no one. The testimony was therefore, in my judgment, properly rejected by the court.

4. A witness for plaintiffs testified that if he had made the same knives for defendant he would have charged the same price that plaintiffs charged, and that it was a "fair market price." Upon cross-examination, he was asked the price he had manufactured them for before. This testimony was rejected by the learned circuit judge upon his own motion, and without any objection from plaintiffs. This testimony was competent, and should have been admitted.

5. During the progress of the trial the court, in the presence of the jury, used the following language: "The only question is as to the value; it don't make any difference how it is fixed. What could these knives be purchased for in the open market?" I think these and other similar remarks were erroneous, for the reasons above given, and tended to mislead the jury; and for these errors the verdict should be set aside, and a new trial ordered. I do not think that the defendant presented his case upon the proper theory, and therefore no costs should be allowed. The testimony he offered and his requests to charge were based solely upon the idea of a fair market value.

1. Subscribers to the stock of corporations which never become fully organized because all the stock is not taken, but which are merged with their consent in a new corporation, cannot set up illegality of the merger or the lack of corporate character of any or all of the companies to defeat their liability as against creditors of the new company after they have permitted it to incur liabilities.

2. Administration in one county will not prevent an administrator of a stockholder from being joined as defendant in another county in a suit in equity to enforce the liability of stockholders.

(October 5, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendants S. S. Jackson, R. C. Winslow and A. E. Litch, administrator of Thomas K. Litch, deceased, from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas for Warren

NOTE.—Corporations are amenable to the rules governing equitable estoppel.

Where both the contracting parties are duly chartered as corporations, the one entering into the contract cannot subsequently deny the corporate existence of the other. The principle of estoppel may be successfully invoked. Smelser v. Wayne & U. S. L. Turnp. Co. 32 Ind. 419; Douglas County v. Bolles, 94 U. S. 104, 24 L. ed. 46; Swartwout v. Michigan A. L. R. Co. 24 Mich. 396; Jones v. Bank of Tennessee, 8 B. Mon. 123; Bigelow, Estoppel, 2d ed. 424; Dutchess Cotton Mfrs. v. Davis, 14 Johns. 244; Hubbard v. Chappel, 14 Ind. 601; Cowell v. Colorado Springs Co. 100 U. S. 55, 25 L. ed. 547; Evansville, I. & C. S. L. R. Co. v. Evansville, 15 Ind. 416; St. Louis Comrs. v. Shields, 62 Mo. 251; Heaston v. Cincinnati & Ft. W. R. Co. 16 Ind. 275; Occidental Ins. Co. v. Ganzhorn, 2 Mo. App. 205; Brownlee v. Ohio, I. & I. R. Co. 18 Ind. 70; Methodist Episc. U. Church v. Pickett, 19 N. Y. 485; Kennedy v. Cotton, 28 Barb. 59.

In the case of the associates in the corporate management and those who have had dealings with it, there is a mutual estoppel, resting upon broad grounds of right, justice and equity. The first class are not suffered to deny their incorporation, nor the second to dispute the validity of their assertions of corporate powers. Armstrong v. Harvey, 11 Ohio St. 527; Methodist Episc. U. Church v. Pickett, supra; Brouwer v. Appleby, 1 Sandf. 158; Ewing v. Robeson, 15 Ind. 29.

The State itself, it has been held in this State, may be precluded by its action or neglect from denying the incorporation (People v. Maynard, 15 Mich. 463); or from taking advantage of a forfeiture after long acquiescence. People v. Oakland County Bank, 1 Doug. (Mich.) 232.

In further illustration of these views, reference is made to Smith v. Heldecker, 39 Mo. 157; Goodrich v. Reynolds, 81 Ill. 490; Low v. Connecticut & P. R. 18 L. R. A.

Co. 45 N. H. 373; Society for Visitation of Sick v. Com. 52 Pa. 125; Heaston v. Cincinnati & Ft. W. R. Co. 16 Ind. 275.

The injustice of permitting a corporation to avoid obligations by pleading its own want of power to incur them is obvious. But it should be remembered that this argument is just as applicable to the case of an individual who sets up the illegality of his own contract, and thus shields himself from responsibility upon it, as to that of a corporation. Their powers are prescribed by statute, and everyone who deals with them is presumed to know the extent of these powers. Where the circumstances are such that this presumption cannot arise, it is conceded that the corporation would be estopped from setting up that its contract was ultra vires. Bissell v. Michigan S. & N. I. R. Co. 22 N. Y. 258.

The sound rule upon the subject is this: A private corporation will be estopped to set up the defense of ultra vires in respect to all acts and contracts within the apparent scope of its powers; and that both private and public corporations will be estopped to set up such defects in their establishment or organization, or in the preliminaries to the execution of their acts, as are peculiarly within their own knowledge. Bigelow, Estoppel, 2d ed. 423.

Corporate powers are limited by charter recitals.

The powers of a corporation are such, and such only, as are conferred on them by the Acts of the Legislature of the several States under which they are organized. Oregon R. & Nav. Co. v. Oregonian R. Co. 130 U. S. 32 L. ed. 837.

That a corporation, as a creature of the Legislature, can possess and exercise "no other powers than those specially conferred by the Act creating it, or such as are incidental or necessary to carry into effect the purposes for which it was created"

County in favor of plaintiffs, who were creditors of the Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Railroad Company, in an action brought to enforce payment of plaintiff's claims out of unpaid subscriptions to the stock of the debtor corporation. Affirmed.

From the findings of the master the following facts appear:

The Mahoning & Susquehanna Railroad Company was incorporated by an Act of Assembly approved April 19, 1854. Supplements to this Act were passed on March 24, 1865, April 9, 1869, April 3, 1872, and April 5, 1873, which made some changes in the commissioners appointed to open subscription books and in the limit to the amount of capital stock, and provided for the extension of time for the completion of the road.

What if any steps were taken to organize this company did not appear, nor did it appear who were its stockholders or what the amount of unpaid stock subscription. No part of this road was ever built or completed.

The Conewango & Clarion Railroad Company became incorporated by Articles of Association filed in the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth on November 22, 1881. Its capital stock was fixed at 20,000 shares of the par value of $50 each. Defendants became subscribers to this stock. The total number of shares subscribed for was 4,008 shares.

These two companies by a joint agreement dated December 6, 1881, and filed in the office of the secretary of the Commonwealth were consolidated and merged into one company, named the Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Railroad Company. By the agreement the companies undertook to consolidate all their rights, powers, privileges, franchises, corporate stock, etc., so that they might form one company, but agreed that all stock actually subscribed for should be canceled.

(Caldwell v. Alton, 33 Ill. 416, 418); that it cannot of its own motion absolve itself from its obligations by transferring its franchise to another (Thomas v. West Jersey R. Co. 101 U. S. 71, 26 L. ed. 950); and that it cannot by a vote of a majority of the stockholders arbitrarily deprive a minority of their interest in its property and practical existence (Kean v. Johnson, 9 N. J. Eq. 413).—are propositions too plain to be disputed. Boston & P. R. Corp. v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 13 R. I. 220.

So Nelson, Ch. J., in Hartford & N. H. R. Co. v. Croswell, 5 Hill, 383, says: "The charter is the fundamental law of the association—the constitution which prescribes limits to the directors, officers, and agents of the company not only, but to the action of the body corporate itself, and no radical change or alteration can be made or allowed, by which new and additional objects are to be accomplished, or responsibilities incurred by the company, so as to bind the individuals composing it, without their assent."

Acts ultra vires of the corporation.

Robbins v. Clay, 38 Me. 132, decides that the directors of a corporation, as such, and without special authority for that purpose, have no authority to make sale of any portion of its property, which is essential for the transaction of its customary business. Kean v. Johnson, 9 N. J. Eq. 401; Bagshaw v. East R. Co. 7 Hare, 114, and Bank of Comrs. v. Bank of Brest, Harr. Ch. (Mich.) 101, are strongly confirmatory of the decision, supra.

An act which, to all intents, terminates the corporation, by taking from it its power to fulfill the purposes of its organization, is not consistent with the purposes of its constitution. That which changes the nature and business of a corporation from that for which it was created does effectually destroy it for all the purposes for which it was formed. It is no longer the same corporation. An act which compels a corporation to change its business is no less valid and repugnant to its charter than an act that directly makes the change. A similar act was styled by Judge Willard "an act of self-destruction which the law cannot tolerate." Conro v. Port Henry Iron Co. 12 Barb. 64.

The chancellor held, in Ward v. Sea Ins. Co. 7 Paige, 294, 4 L. ed. 162, "that the directors of a corporation could not, even with the consent of the stockholders, discontinue the corporate business and distribute the capital stock among the stockholders, unless expressly authorized by legislative Act." It is true that this decision proceeds upon principles of public policy, but it throws light upon 18 L. R. A.

the question as to the power of directors and the limitations upon their power.

So, also, a lease or sale of one railroad to another, without express authority from the Legislature, is beyond the power of the directors or a majority of the stockholders as against a dissenting stockholder. It is a violation of the implied contract between the corporation and each stockholder that the business prescribed in the charter will be pursued until the dissolution of the corporation. Generally the lease of a railroad is made under an agreement whereby the stockholders of the old corporation are guaranteed a certain income. The effect in any case, however, is not a continuation of the business of the old corporation, but an abandonment of it. It is an act ultra vires of the corporation, and in violation of the contract between the corporation and its stockholders. A single stockholder may obtain an injunction against the lease, or if it is already made, may go into a court of equity and have it set aside. Cook, Stock and Stockholders, 2d ed. § 668, citing Winch v. Birkenhead, L. & C. J. R. Co. 5 De G. & S. 562; Cass v. Manchester J. & S. Co. 9 Fed. Rep. 640; Stevens v. Davison, 13 Gratt. 819; South Georgia & F. R. Co. v. Ayres, 56 Ga. 230; Tippecanoe County Comrs. v. Lafayette, M. & B. R. Co. 50 Ind. 85; Black v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 24 N. J. Eq. 465, reversing 22 N. J. Eq. 130; Simpson v. Denison, 10 Hare, 51; Clinch v. Financial Corp. L. R. 5 Eq. 450; Kean v. Johnson, 9 N. J. Eq. 401.

But though a corporation cannot directly put an end to its existence, and merge it by any process of amalgamation in that of another, yet it may accomplish this in an indirect and circuitous manner. It may do so by transferring its property, funds, rights, and liabilities to the other contracting corporation, and then voluntarily dissolving itself, usually by winding up. Generally the arrangement is supplemented by a proviso, whereby the transferee, the purchasing company, indemnifies the selling company against the liabilities which it may be under in respect of claims, existing or prospective. Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 607, citing Anglo-Australian L. Assur. Co. v. British Provident S. & F. Soc. 8 Giff. 521, 4 De G. F. & J. 341; Re Albert L. Asso. L. R. 11 Eq. 164.

Consolidation; amalgamation; merger.

Authority is frequently given to corporations either by special charter or by general law, "to consolidate" with other corporations. The meaning to be attached to the word "consolidated," when thus applied, and the important legal consequences following from a consolidation, have, as yet, been only partly determined by the courts. It

This agreement was signed inter alia by Stephen S. Jackson and R. C. Winslow, both of whom became officers of the new company. Thomas K. Litch was named as a director of the new company.

The capital stock of the new company was fixed at 120,000 shares of the par value of $50 each. It did not appear that any of this stock was subscribed for.

On December 21, 1881, the Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Company entered into a contract for the construction of its road, which was signed by Jackson and Winslow. Nothing was ever done under this contract. There has been no election of directors, or work done under the company's charter since 1888. During the period from November, 1884, to June, 1886, plaintiffs recovered judgments against the company, which is insolvent.

As conclusions of law, the master found, inter alia, as follows:

is plain that corporations cannot be consolidated without the consent of the shareholders of both companies, and that this consent cannot be implied. A consolidation would involve the formation of a new company by the shareholders, under a new constitution. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 2d ed. §§ 930, 940.

The Legislature may, when public necessity requires it, grant authority to consolidate existing connecting railroad routes, if they provide a just compensation for the shares of such stockholders as dissent. Black v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 24 N. J. Eq. 455.

As a general rule, the consent of every stockholder is necessary for consolidation, and those who dissent cannot be compelled. Ibid.; Kean v. Johnson, 9 N. J. Eq. 401; Fisher v. Evansville & C. R. Co. 7 Ind. 407; Blatchford v. Ross, 5 Abb. Pr. N. S. 434, 54 Barb. 42; Chapman v. Mad River & L. E. R. Co. 5 Ohio St. 119. And see Re Empire Assur. Co. L. R. 4 Eq. 341.

There is no power to force a dissenting stockholder to join the new corporation, and to receive stock in it on the surrender of his stock in the old company. Ferguson v. Meredith, 68 U. S. 1 Wall. 25, 17 L. ed. 604. And see McMahan v. Morrison, 16 Ind. 172; Mowrey v. Indianapolis & C. R. Co. 4 Bias. 78.

And a consolidation without his consent relieves him from liability on his subscription, or entitles him to recover his interest. Shelbyville & R. Turnp. Co. v. Barnes, 42 Ind. 498; Lauman v. Lebanon Valley R. Co. 30 Pa. 42; Illinois G. T. R. Co. v. Cook, 28 Ill. 237. Compare Cork & T. R. Co. v. Paterson, 18 C. 414; Midland G. W. R. of Ireland v. Leech, 3 H. L. Cas. 872; Boone, Corp. § 188.

Where power is given by statute to one railroad corporation to consolidate with any other, whatever other corporation it selects for a union, and finds willing to join it, has power to unite with it, although such other corporation is not named in the Statute. Re Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. 67 N. Y. 371.

That the company with which the consolidation is effected belongs to another State is immaterial. Scotland County v. Thomas, 94 U. S. 682, 24 L. ed. 219.

Strictly speaking, a merger of one corporation into another "is a dissolution, destroying the actual identity of both, while the legal identity of one of them is preserved. As where a life estate is merged into a fee simple, one being destroyed and the other enlarged by the operation." Lauman v. Lebanon Valley R. Co. 30 Pa. 42.

The consolidation may be authorized either by the charters of the corporations, by general laws, 18 L. R. A.

3. It is not a good defense to the defendants in this action, that the Conewango & Clarion Railroad Company and Mahoning & Susquehanna Railroad Company were merged and consolidated into a new company as the Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Railroad Company. The regularity of such merger and consolidation cannot be questioned collaterally in this proceeding.

4. The Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Railroad Company being a de facto if not a de jure corporation, the defendants who have dealt with it in its corporate capacity cannot in this proceeding question the legality of the corporation.

5. As against these creditors of the Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Railroad Company, the defendants cannot defend on the ground that all the stock of the corporation has not been subscribed for.

Where two or more railroad companies are consolidated, as far as the creditors of one of the original companies are concerned, the consolidated company is successor of the old company; but in respect to the properties of the other companies it is a new and independent company, and such creditors have no claim against it upon their original contracts but only by virtue of its assumption of the obligations of the old companies. Prouty v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 52 N. Y. 363.

The English doctrine of amalgamation.

The recognized English doctrine on the subject of amalgamation is, that a majority of the members cannot amalgamate, and transform shares from one association into another, as such a proceeding would be ultra vires. Field, Corp. § 425.

Mr. Brice observes: "It may do so by transferring its property, funds, rights and liabilities to the other contracting corporation, and then voluntarily dissolving itself, usually by a winding-up. Generally the arrangement is supplemented by a proviso, whereby a transferee, the purchasing company, indemnifies the selling company against the liabilities which it may be under in respect to claims existing or prospective. This, after all, is not an amalgamation; it is not a union of one corporation with another, but is simply a transfer of assets, with attendant responsibilities. It is, however, a sufficient amalgamation for all practical purposes, and it is therefore the process always adopted." Green's Brice, Ultra Vires, 513; Anglo-Australian L. Assur. Co. v. British Provident S. & F. Soc. 3 Giff. 521, 4 DeG. F. & J. 341. See also same principle in Hodges v. New England Screw Co. 1 R. I. 312, 3 R. I. 9; Booth v. Bunce, 33 N. Y. 139; *Rorke v. Company and Mahoning & Susquehanna Railroad Company, that all their stock actually subscribed for shall be canceled, is not sufficient to relieve the defendants from liability to the creditors of the Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Railroad Company upon their unpaid subscriptions to the Conewango & Clarion Railroad Company.

The material parts of the master's opinion are as follows:

It is very strenuously urged on behalf of the defense, that the merger and consolidation of the Conewango & Clarion Railroad Company, and the Mahoning & Susquehanna Railroad Company, into a new company, or into a company with a new name, is illegal. I agree with the learned counsel for some of the defendants, Mr. Corbet, that, under the law, the merger should be of one existing railroad company into another existing railroad company. But I do not agree with him that because two railroad companies have merged into a new company, or into a company with a new name, such merger is so illegal as to constitute a valid defense in favor of the subscribers to the capital stock of one of the companies, in a suit by judgment creditors of the new corporation. The law carefully gives a remedy to the stockholders if they are dissatisfied with, or object to, the consolidation. Section 8 of the Act of May 16, 1861, Pub. Laws, 708, entitled "An Act Relating to Railroad Companies," provides for the disposition of the stock of dissatisfied stockholders, in cases of consolidated companies. Section 2 of the same Act provides for notice to the stockholders of the intended consolidation and method of voting thereon. The forms of law have been gone through with, and the agreement of consolidation of the two companies has been filed in the proper office at Harrisburg. No objection to this consolidation has been raised by any one of these defendants, so far as we are advised by the evidence. After all this, it will be presumed that the law was complied with so far as notice to them of the intended consolidation was concerned, and that they were satisfied with the merger. But more than that, in this case several of the defendants have dealt with the new corporation in various ways. In so far, they have invited others to deal with the consolidated corporation, and I think are held out to the world to give it credit.

The corporation defendant is a corporation de facto if not de jure. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. §§ 133, 145.

In the latter section it is said: "The rules referred to in the preceding sections are applicable in an action brought by a creditor of an insolvent corporation, to enforce the liability of its stockholders to pay the amount of their stock subscriptions. In a case of this character, the defendant cannot impeach the binding force of their contracts of membership by showing that the formation of the corporation was unauthorized by law, nor can they establish the invalidity of the obligation assumed by the company in favor of complainant, upon the ground that the company had no authority to act in a corporate capacity." And see McHose v. Wheeler, 45 Pa. 32.

It is urged on behalf of some of the defendants as a ground of defense, that all the stock of the Conewango & Clarion Railroad Company was not subscribed for. I think this would be a complete defense in an action by the corporation to recover unpaid subscriptions to its capital stock. But it does not follow that a defense, good between the subscriber to its capital stock and the corporation, is good in a suit between such subscriber and a creditor of the corporation. After having permitted unquestioned the consolidation of the companies, and the consolidated company to make contracts and incur liabilities, I do not see how this defense can be interposed.

In Morawetz on Private Corporations, § 285, it is said: "A stockholder may waive the performance of a condition precedent to his liability to contribute his proportionate share of the capital of the company; and after such waiver he will be liable as if the conditions had been performed. Yet if a subscriber, knowing that the requisite subscriptions had not been obtained, should attend meetings of the corporation and co-operate in votes for expending money and for making contracts, or take part in any other acts which could be properly done only upon the assumption that the capital of the company had been fully subscribed, he would not be permitted to refuse to contribute his proportion of capital upon the ground that the amount required by the charter had not been subscribed."

In section 135 of the same work it is said: "For similar reasons it has been held that a stockholder might be estopped by his conduct from setting up as a defense to an action for calls that the number of shares required by law to authorize the corporation to be founded have not been subscribed."

It is urged in opposition to this view that those dealing with the corporation are bound to know that all the stock has not been subscribed to. There is some force in this view; yet I think that those persons who originate a corporation should see that it does not act, until the implied condition on which they subscribed has been complied with; and that when it does act persons dealing with it have a right to assume that the precedent conditions have been complied with. Neither do I think that the stipulation in the agreement of merger, that, "all the stock of the two first-mentioned companies actually subscribed for shall be canceled," constitutes a good defense. This stipulation is followed by the provision, "That the Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Railroad Company shall and will issue to the several holders and owners of, or subscribers to, the stock of the Conewango & Clarion Railroad Company, and the several owners and holders of, or subscribers to, the stock of the two last-named companies shall be entitled to receive for every share thereof one share of the capital stock of the Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Railroad Company." The plain intent and effect of this agreement is to substitute the stock of the consolidated company for the stock of the companies which have become merged in it. It is the stock that is canceled and not the subscription for stock. Any other construction would have been to denude the consolidated company of all advantages from the subscriptions to the capital stock of the two companies merged in it.

The construction I have given this agreement is in harmony with the provision contained in the third section of the Act of May 16, 1861, Pub. Laws, 703, that, "all the property, real, personal and mixed, and debts due and rights of action, shall be deemed and taken to be transferred to, and vested in the company into which such merger may have been made, without further act or deed; and all property, all rights of way, and all other interests, shall be as effectually the property of such company or corporation into which such merger may have been made, as they were of either of the former corporations, parties to said agreement." And see Lane's App. 105 Pa. 62.

The important assignments of error are as follows:

1. In not sustaining joint exception number 4 which is as follows: "In not finding that there was no legal or sufficient evidence that the alleged Mahoning & Susquehanna Railroad Company ever existed as a corporation."

2. In not sustaining joint exception number 11, which is as follows: "In not finding that there was no legal or sufficient evidence that the alleged Conewango & Clarion Railroad Company was a corporation."

3. In not sustaining joint exception number 14, which is as follows: "In not finding it was incumbent on the plaintiffs, the same having been put in issue by the pleadings, to establish the existence of the corporation by them styled the Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Railroad Company, and that its existence was legal, which plaintiffs did not do; but on the contrary the evidence adduced by them showed that such company had no corporate existence by any warrant or authority of law."

4. In not finding, vide Litch's 9th and Winslow and Jackson's 5th exceptions, as therein stated: "That T. K. Litch, R. C. Winslow, and S. S. Jackson, severally, never became stockholders of the Conewango & Clarion Railroad Company; that there was no evidence that any stock certificates were ever issued by it, or tendered either of them; or that such company ever so far organized that they could have complied with their respective agreements to take shares of stock therein."

11. (Assigned on behalf of E. A. Litch, administrator.) In not sustaining the 40th exception of E. A. Litch, administrator, that the Master erred in his 10th conclusion of law, which is as follows: "This suit may be maintained in Warren County against E. A. Litch, administrator of the estate of Thomas K. Litch, deceased, joined with other defendants, for their unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of the Conewango & Clarion Railroad Company notwithstanding the residence and domicile of Thomas K. Litch in Jefferson County, at the time of his death, and the granting of letters of administration upon his estate by the Register of Jefferson County."

Cochran v. Arnold, 58 Pa. 405.

Paxson, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The opinion of the learned master covers this case so fully that an elaborate discussion of it is unnecessary. The main contention on the part of the appellants was that the Mahoning & Susquehanna Railroad Company, the Conewango & Clarion Railroad Company, and the Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Railroad Company never had a legal corporate existence; that the said appellants, T. R. Litch, R. C. Winslow, and S. S. Jackson never became stockholders in the last-named company, and that said company was never so far organized that they could have complied with their respective agreements to take shares of stock therein. See first, second, third, and fourth assignments of error.

It would be tedious to detail all the proceedings in relation to the organization of these companies, and the merger of the first two companies into a consolidated corporation under the name of the Clarion, Mahoning & Pittsburgh Railroad Company. All this has been carefully done by the learned master. It is enough to say that the merger sufficiently appeared by the certificate of the secretary of the Commonwealth, and the effect of it was, under 18 L. R. A.

the third section of the Act of May 16, 1861, Pub. Laws, 702, to vest in the consolidated company all the property, rights and franchises of said companies subject to all rights of their respective creditors. The consolidated company is estopped by the decree pro confesso from alleging that it is not a corporation de jure and liable as charged in the bill to the plaintiffs, who are the appellees here, and who have recovered judgments against it in actions at law. It is idle, as against creditors, to set up the defense that the corporation had no legal existence. It had sufficient existence to contract debts, and in the interests of its creditors it must at least be treated as a de facto corporation. And if there is anything settled in the law it is that the existence of a corporation de facto cannot be inquired into collaterally. Cochran v. Arnold, 58 Pa. 399. Much less can such a corporation or a stockholder therein set up a defect in its charter as against a creditor who has contracted with it upon the faith of its charter. We are not considering the case of a subscriber to shares who refuses to pay his subscription on the ground that the organization has not been perfected, and the cases cited upon this point have no application.

We are clearly of opinion that by force of the articles of consolidation and the Act of Assembly the subscription to the stock of the Conewango & Clarion Railroad Company inured to the benefit of the consolidated company, and became an asset in its hands for the payment of debts, and that the subscribers thereof are liable to the creditors of the latter to the amount of their unpaid subscriptions. This bill was filed to enforce this personal liability against certain of the stockholders. The corporation itself is admittedly insolvent. It does not appear to have any available assets. While it is well settled that a single creditor may not sue a particular stockholder at law, and thus secure an advantage over other stockholders (see Bunn's App. 105 Pa. 49), yet this bill was filed by or on behalf of all the creditors against the corporation, and its stockholders, precisely as was done in Bunn's App., supra. The rights of all parties, therefore, can be adjusted in the one proceeding, and the decree of the court below is so framed as to compel contribution in case any one defendant is required to pay more than his just proportion.

A point was made that this suit cannot be maintained against E. A. Litch in Warren County for the reason that he is sued as administrator of Thomas K. Litch, deceased, the domicile of said administrator being in Jefferson County, in which county the letters of administration were taken out. See eleventh assignment.

This objection is based upon the ground that the Orphans' Court of Jefferson has the exclusive jurisdiction over the estate of said decedent. It may be conceded that the estate of Thomas R. Litch cannot be distributed by the Common Pleas of Warren, but no such question arises here. It is not a question of distribution but of the fixing of a liability or of a right. When that is ascertained it will be for the Orphans' Court of Jefferson to decide to what extent it can be enforced against the estate. That will depend upon the amount of the estate and the rights of other creditors. Aside from this it must not be overlooked that it was a bill in equity, and the court acquired jurisdiction over E. A. Litch, administrator, because said court had "acquired jurisdiction of the subject matter in controversy by the service of its process on one or more of the principal defendants." Act of April 6, 1869, Pub. Laws, 387.

No question appears to have been raised as to the regularity of the proceeding under this Act. It was urged that the administrator should not have been joined with living parties, and we are asked what execution would issue on a judgment against a survivor and the representative of a deceased party? If this were a judgment at law there would have been more force in this suggestion, but a court of equity can always mould its decrees to meet the difficulties of the case, and do no injustice to anyone.

The decree is affirmed and the appeal dismissed at the costs of the appellants.

A person may have more than one residence, and it is not necessary that an original notice be served at the one where he is located at the time of service, and in the absence of clear and unmistakable evidence that plaintiff did not have a residence in Sioux City, the return itself must stand as evidence of the fact of his residence there.

Love v. Cherry, 24 Iowa, 204; Story, Conf. Laws, §§ 39-49; Hinds v. Hinds, supra; Penley v. Waterhouse, 1 Iowa, 498.

Messrs. O. C. Tredway, Argo & McDuffie and W. G. Clarke for appellee.

Beck, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The plaintiff executed a mortgage to defendant De Peyster to secure the payment of $600 and interest payable upon maturity of certain notes given therefor. Upon the maturity and non-payment of interest, an action to foreclose the mortgage was instituted, and a decree of foreclosure was rendered, and a sale of the land thereon was for the amount of the judgment for interest, with attorneys' fees and costs. Plaintiff seeks in this action to redeem from the sale and mortgage, basing his right on the ground, among others, that the decree of foreclosure is void, for the reason that the original notice in the case was not served upon him as required by law. The service was made by copy delivered to a member of his family (his wife) at his alleged usual place of residence in this State. Plaintiff alleges that his usual place of residence at the time of service was in the Black Hills, Dak., and not in Iowa, and insists, therefore, that the decree is void for want of jurisdiction of his person.

2. The record very satisfactorily shows that about eighteen months before the service of the notice defendant, who then lived with his family in Sioux City, went to the Black Hills, intending to make his home there. He left his family consisting of a wife and children, in Sioux City, intending to remove them to the Black Hills as soon as he could do so. He engaged in mining and other business in the Black Hills, and built a house, shop, and other buildings there. He voted at the elections and sat upon juries and discharged other duties of a citizen, but did not remove his family there, though continually intending so to do. He visited his family about two years after he went to the Black Hills, and repeated the visit at long intervals. He never abandoned his purpose of removing his family to Dakota. He seems to have done no act indicating that he regarded Iowa as the place of his residence. We think that actual residence, with the purpose and intent that it is and shall be permanent, fixes the legal residence contemplated by the Statute providing for service of original notices of actions by a copy delivered to a member of defendant's family at his usual place of residence, without regard to the place of residence of his family. We know of no rule which fixes absolutely a man's residence at the place of residence of his wife and family. A presumption may arise that his residence is with his family, but that presumption may be overcome by evidence showing the fact to be otherwise. Such presumption is in this way overcome by the evidence in this case. In support of these views, see the following cases: Cohen v. Daniels, 25 Iowa, 88; Vanderpool v. O'Hanlon, 53 Iowa, 246; Ringgold v. Barley, 5 Md. 186; Gilman v. Gilman, 62 Me. 185; Hairston v. Hairston, 27 Miss. 704.

Love v. Cherry, 24 Iowa, 204, cited by counsel for defendant, is not in conflict with our conclusions in this case. Because of absence of intention to make the residence in question permanent, and a continual purpose to return to a prior place of residence, it was held in that case that at such prior place of residence service of notice could be lawfully made by copy upon a member of defendant's family. In this case there was a fixed and constant purpose to remove plaintiff's family to the Black Hills which was all the time regarded by him as the permanent place of residence and home of plaintiff. This purpose was never relinquished or changed, and there is no evidence showing facts in conflict thereto. It is our conclusion that the decree of foreclosure is void for want of jurisdiction of the person of plaintiff, and for this reason he may redeem from sale and mortgage.

3. Plaintiff complains of the amount which he is required by the decree to pay in order to make the redemption. We think the evidence well supports the correctness of the decree in this regard. Besides, as plaintiff did not appeal, he is not in a condition to complain of the decree, and ask that it be reversed or changed in this court. By the decree of the court below, plaintiff had ninety days from the rendition thereof in which to make redemption. That time has expired pending the appeal which prevented performance by plaintiff. The time for redemption ought to be extended for ninety days after the entering of final decree and judgment upon this appeal.

The decree of the District Court is affirmed, with the modification just suggested, that plaintiff have ninety days in which to redeem. A decree to that effect will be entered in this court.

v.

GERMANIA SAVINGS BANK, Kings County, Appt.

(.....N. Y.....)

1. That the signature to the receipt by one receiving payment of a savings bank deposit did not seem exactly right to the bank officials is sufficient to make a question for the jury as to negligence in paying over the money to him, especially where the genuine and forged signatures are both in evidence.

2. Active vigilance to detect fraud and forgery is due by savings bank officers to a depositor on paying the deposit to one presenting the pass-book, although the by-laws provide that the bank will not be responsible for fraud in presenting the bank-book and drawing the money, where they also require its presentation by the owner or his agent duly constituted by a writing signed and acknowledged, as a condition of payment.

(October 6, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of the Kings County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount of a savings bank deposit. Affirmed.

NOTE.—For liability of bank on payment of forged or altered paper, see Atlanta Nat. Bank v. Burke (Ga.) 2 L. R. A. 98, note; Deposit Bank v. Fayette Nat. Bank (Ky.) 7 L. R. A. 849, note.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Mr. Matthew Hale, with Mr. William D. Veeder, for appellant:

When a savings bank has prescribed rules, and its depositor has assented to them, they are the agreement, and each party must keep it, to preserve rights against the other. The extent of the duty which the savings bank is under will, in some degree, be measured by the strictness or extent of the rule it has put upon itself.

Allen v. Williamsburgh Sav. Bank, 69 N. Y. 314.

It is the duty of a court to give effect to all of the provisions and language used in framing a law, if it is susceptible of such a construction, and they are precluded from giving it such an effect as will render any of its clauses inoperative or ineffectual.

Smith v. Brooklyn Sav. Bank, 1 Cent. Rep. 801, 101 N. Y. 62.

In this case the provision that payments should not be made unless the depositor should call for and receive the same in person or by attorney, should be regarded as qualified by what follows: That the Bank will not be responsible to any depositor for a fraud committed upon the officers in producing the pass-book and drawing the money without the knowledge or consent of the owner.

The mere location of the covenants in a deed does not have any significance.

Phenix Ins. Co. v. Continental Ins. Co. 87 N. Y. 400.

The plaintiff was bound to show affirmatively that the defendant did not exercise ordinary care and diligence at the time it paid out the money. This he failed to do.

Israel v. Bowers Sav. Bank, 9 Daly, 507.

Where it is sought to hold another liable for negligence, the negligence is to be made out by some positive proof, or by proof of circumstances from which the jury may fairly infer its existence.

Heaney v. Long Island R. Co. 112 N. Y. 122.

Mr. Hugo Hirsh, for respondent:

Fraud does not absolve the bank from liability if it does not take ordinary care and precaution to discover and avoid it.

Smith v. Brooklyn Sav. Bank, 1 Cent. Rep. 801, 101 N. Y. 58; Evans v. People's Sav. Bank, 27 Conn. 233; Allen v. Williamsburgh Sav. Bank, 69 N. Y. 318; Boone v. Citizen's Sav. Bank, 84 N. Y. 88; Appleby v. Erie County Sav. Bank, 62 N. Y. 18; Israel v. Bowers Sav. Bank, 9 Daly, 509; Underhill v. Poughkeepsie Sav. Bank, 32 Hun, 482.

The relation of a depositor to this Bank is that of creditor, and upon an accounting it is liable for all such sums deposited as it has paid away without receiving valid directions therefor.

People v. Mechanics & T. Sav. Inst. 92 N. Y. 9; Crawford v. West Side Bank, 1 Cent. Rep. 253, 100 N. Y. 53.

There can be no pretense on the evidence in this case that the Bank believed it was paying the depositor.

The submission to the jury of the question whether the defendant exercised reasonable care and diligence in order to see that the party to whom it paid money was entitled to it, was a more favorable submission than it had a right to receive.

Ouderkirk v. Central Nat. Bank, 119 N. Y. 263.

It appears from the entire case that the defendant relied almost exclusively upon its by-law permitting it to pay the money to anyone who produced the pass-book, and upon the case of Schoenwald v. Metropolitan Sav. Bank, 57 N. Y. 418.

Haight, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought to recover the sum $450.11, being balance of amount deposited by the plaintiff with the defendant. It appears that this balance had in fact been paid by the Bank upon a forged check or receipt to a stranger, who had stolen the pass-book from the plaintiff. At the time the plaintiff opened his account with the Bank, he subscribed his name in a book kept for that purpose, giving his place of residence, place of birth, the names of his parents, brothers, and sisters, etc. A pass-book was issued to him, in which was entered the amounts of deposits made by him from time to time. Among the by-laws printed in the book appears the following: "Payments shall not be made unless the depositor shall call for and receive the same in person, or by an attorney duly constituted by writing, signed and acknowledged. When the payment is made, the pass-book must be produced. When the entire deposit is withdrawn, the pass-book must be surrendered. . . . The Bank will not be responsible to any depositor for any fraud committed on the officers in producing the pass-book and drawing money without the knowledge or consent of the owner." The money in controversy was drawn upon two different occasions,—$100 on the 13th day of April, 1888, and the remaining $350.11 on the 17th day of April thereafter. The court, in submitting the case to the jury, charged that the by-laws printed in the pass-book constituted a contract between the depositor and the Bank, and governed their relations; that a payment made in good faith, in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, by the officers of the Bank to a person presenting the pass-book, even though obtained by fraud, and who was not a depositor, was a valid payment. The question thus presented for the determination of the jury was as to whether the officers of the defendant had exercised ordinary care and diligence in seeing that the person to whom the money was paid was authorized to receive it.

The first question which we are called upon to consider is as to whether the evidence was of such a character as to justify the submission of this question to the jury. The $350 item was paid by the cashier, Frederick Koch. He states that he asked the person presenting the bank-book where he lived, and that he at first answered "New York," and that afterwards he stated that he had lived in Brooklyn before that, at 56 Tillary Street; that he did not ask him any further questions, but paid him the money. The other payment was made by Oscar Thomas, a clerk, who assisted the cashier. He judged from the first that the signature to the receipt was not exactly right, and asked the person presenting it if he could not write with a more fluent hand, and received the answer that he was not feeling well. He thinks he put the other questions to him appearing upon the signature book, and that they were answered correctly. As to the payment of the $350 receipt, the question of negligence was clearly for the jury. It affirmatively appears that the cashier did not avail himself of the means at hand to identify the person presenting the pass-book and forged receipt. As to the $100 payment, the question is involved in more doubt; but, in view of the fact that the acting cashier making the payment was an interested witness, that the signature to the receipt was such as to lead him to judge that it was not right, and that upon the trial the signature of the plaintiff, as well as that upon the receipt, was before the court and the jury for comparison, upon which the variance may have been so great as, of itself, to put a prudent person upon inquiry, we are inclined to the view that this question was also one for the jury, and that no error is apparent that would justify a reversal.

In the second place, it is contended that, the Bank having paid in good faith to the party presenting the pass-book, it is not liable, even though negligent; and the case of Schoenwald v. Metropolitan Sav. Bank, 57 N. Y. 418, is cited as sustaining such a rule. There are some expressions in the opinion in that case which tend to sustain the appellant's claim; as, for instance: "Nor do I see that it was at all material to the defendant whether the order was a forgery or not. The defendant was at liberty to pay the amount of the deposit to any person presenting the pass-book. No order of the depositor was required. A forged order, while ordinarily of no legal effect, was at least equal to no order at all; so that it appears to me the bank had the right to make the payment it did on a simple production of the pass-book." But that doctrine has been criticised, and has not been followed, in later cases. Allen v. Williamsburgh Sav. Bank, 69 N. Y. 314; Boone v. Citizens Sav. Bank, 84 N. Y. 83-88; Smith v. Brooklyn Sav. Bank, 101 N. Y. 63, 1 Cent. Rep. 801. In the Schoenwald Case the chief question litigated was as to whether the order upon which the money was paid was a forgery, and the question of negligence does not appear to have been considered. In the case of Appleby v. Erie County Sav. Bank, 62 N. Y. 12, it was held that the rules prescribed by a savings bank for its protection in the payment of deposits do not dispense with the exercise of ordinary care upon the part of its officers; and if, by a custom or regulation adopted by it, designed to prevent fraud, a fact is brought to the knowledge of the officers calculated to excite suspicion and inquiry, a failure to institute such inquiry is negligence for which the bank is liable. It was, however, held that, inasmuch as the charge of negligence rested upon the dissimilarity in the signatures, the discrepancy should be such as could be readily discovered by a competent person; that there was no evidence of that character, and, inasmuch as the trial court had the benefit of a personal inspection, the difference in the letters may not have been such as to indicate a different handwriting; that on review the court had no means of determining but that the trial court properly decided that the dissimilarity was of such a character that negligence could not be predicated upon a failure to discover it. See cases above cited.

The pass-book of a savings bank cannot be regarded as negotiable, and its possession does not constitute proof of a right to draw money thereon. The book imports a liability of the bank to the depositor for the amount of moneys entered therein as deposited, and an agreement to repay at such time and in such manner as he shall direct. Assuming that the by-laws printed in the book are binding upon the depositor, and constitute a contract between the parties, we still think that the duty devolves upon the officers of the bank to exercise care and diligence, in order that their depositors may be protected from fraud and larceny. The defendant by its by-laws, to which we have called attention, has undertaken with the plaintiff that payment shall not be made unless he shall call for the same in person, or by an attorney duly constituted by writing, signed and acknowledged. Here is a positive and direct agreement, which would absolutely protect the plaintiff from losses of this character. This agreement, however, must be considered as modified by that which follows, to the effect that the bank will not be responsible for fraud committed on its officers in producing the pass-book and drawing money without the knowledge or consent of the owner; but this modification does not permit the officers to carelessly shut their eyes, and pay to any person presenting the pass-book, but, on the contrary, they owe the depositor active vigilance, in order to detect fraud and forgery.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.
All concur.

METROPOLITAN ELEVATED R. CO. et al., Appts.

(.....N. Y.....)

1. An equitable remedy to restrain continuous trespasses upon real estate is not barred by the lapse of ten years from the time of the original trespass under Code Civ. Proc., § 888, fixing that limit for actions the time for which is not otherwise specially prescribed. It will not be barred so long as the legal title is in the plaintiff and his right of action at law for injuries is not barred.
2. No estoppel against an injunction to restrain continuing trespasses by the operation of an elevated railroad in a street in front of plaintiff's premises arises out of his mere delay to bring suit for eleven years after the original trespass and his occasional riding on the road as a passenger, although his only protest against the construction of the road was by subscription to pay counsel to prevent it.
3. That an elevated railroad track was intended to be and was in fact made a permanent structure does not prevent its being a continuing trespass upon the easements of landowners abutting upon the street through 13 L. R. A.

which it is constructed so as to take it out of the rule of limitations applicable to actions for continuing trespasses and bar all remedy unless the action is brought within the time after its construction prescribed in case of a single trespass.

(October 6, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for New York County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to compel payment of damages because of defendant's alleged interference with plaintiff's easements in a certain street. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. John F. Dillon, Julien T. Davies and J. C. Thomson, for appellants:

I. The plaintiff's right to maintain an action in equity to enjoin the maintenance and operation of the defendants' railway, and to recover damages to the inheritance by reason of the permanence of the structure, is barred by the ten years' limitation contained in § 888 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The limitation of ten years is applicable to equitable remedies.

Y. 69; Butler v. Johnson, 111 N. Y. 204; Hubbell v. Sibley, 50 N. Y. 468; Peters v. Delaplaine, 49 N. Y. 362; Oakes v. Howell, 27 How. Pr. 145; Roberts v. Sykes, 80 Barb. 178; *Wood v. This rule is subject to an important qualification. It is applicable only when courts of equity have exclusive jurisdiction of the action.

Although courts of equity were never deemed to be within the terms of the Statute of Limitations, they were bound by their terms where they exercised only a concurrent jurisdiction with courts of law.

A cause of action does not exist at law to recover damages once for all in an action of this character, because the illegal structure cannot be regarded as permanent in a court of law.

A cause of action exists in equity in a case of this character.

Henderson v. New York Cent. R. Co. 78 N. Y. 423.

The present suit is within the rules governing purely equitable remedies.

A suit in equity may be barred by the equitable limitation, although the plaintiff may have resorted to a court of equity to establish or enforce a legal right which is not barred.

Peters v. Delaplaine, 49 N. Y. 362; Calhoun v. Millard, 8 L. R. A. 248, 121 N. Y. 69; Hubbell v. Sibley, 50 N. Y. 468; McTeague v. Coulter, 6 Jones & S. 208.

Courts of equity have exclusive jurisdiction of suits for injunction.

There can be no recovery in an action at law of future damages for a continuing nuisance or trespass.

The cause of action at law is the injurious effects which have been caused by the unlawful structure in the past.

People v. Clark, 70 N. Y. 518; Lexington City Nat. Bank v. Gwynn, 6 Bush, 486; Me- nard v. Hood, 68 Ill. 121; Wangeun v. Goe, 50 Ill. 459; Atty-Gen. v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. 3 N. J. Eq. 136; Owen v. Ford, 49 Mo. 436; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Patton, 5 W. Va. 234; Cole v. Duke, 79 Ind. 107; Georgia Pac. R. Co. v. Douglassville, 75 Ga. 828; East Saginaw Street R. Co. v. Wildman, 58 Mich. 286; Smith v. Davis, 22 Fla. 405; Ewing v. Rourke, 14 Or. 514.

There is thus a clearly marked distinction between the causes of action at law and in equity in cases of this kind.

Where the wrong against which relief is sought has been consummated by a single act done with a view to a permanent condition that will continue without change from any cause but human labor, the action is barred by the lapse of the statutory period, and the Statute commences to run from the time when the act causing the original damage was committed.

Code Civ. Proc. § 415.

It is against the maintenance of the structure itself that an injunction runs. If the maintenance of the structure were not a trespass upon plaintiff's rights, the operation of the road would be beyond attack, and its effects could not be complained of by abutters, even if consequential injuries were effected.

Story v. New York Elev. R. Co. 90 N. Y. 160; Fobes v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. 8 L. R. A. 453, 121 N. Y. 505; Kane v. New York Elev. R. Co. 11 L. R. A. 640, 125 N. Y. 164; Lahr v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 6 Cent. Rep. 871, 104 N. Y. 295.

The cause of action in equity which springs into existence upon the erection or threatened erection of an unlawful structure consists in the sum total of the injurious consequences that are reasonably to be anticipated to result from the structure. As time passes, these anticipated consequences sometimes become realities and give rise, from day to day and from hour to hour, to distinct causes of action at law. But it cannot be said that distinct causes of action in equity also arise.

2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1521a; Bruce v. Tilson, 25 N. Y. 194; Peters v. Delaplaine, 49 N. Y. 362; High, Inj. §§ 7, 10, 618, 643, 731, 756, 797, 837, 884, 895, 926.

Plaintiff's right to relief accrued "when the defendant began to construct its railway in front of his lots." It necessarily follows that the ten years' limitation began to run against his right to relief at the same time.

When the Statute has begun to run, its operation will only be suspended by the intervention of some of the statutory exceptions, or by the commencement of an action.

Piper v. Board, 9 Cent. Rep. 445, 107 N. Y. 67. See Henderson v. New York Cent. R. Co. 78 N. Y. 423; Uline v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 2 Cent. Rep. 116, 101 N. Y. 98.

The rule which we ask this court to follow in equitable actions is logical and supported by authority.

New York Elev. R. Co. v. Fifth Nat. Bank, 135 U. S. 432, 34 L. ed. 231.

This court has admitted that the adoption of such a rule would have been productive of less inconvenience, even in actions at law.

Pond v. Metropolitan Eler. R. Co. 112 N. Y. 186.

When the nuisance or trespass is continuing in its character, and the original injury was permanent in its effect, so as to give but one cause of action in which complete compensation for the tort may be recovered, the Statute commenced to run when the injury was first effected.

Rep. 398; Lyles v. Texas & N. O. R. Co. 73 Tex. 95; Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Chaffin, 60 Tex. 554.

II. The plaintiff is precluded by his laches and acquiescence from seeking relief in a court of equity.

In other jurisdictions the effect of silence, neglect, and delay under similar circumstances has often been before the court, and the decisions have uniformly been that relief by injunction must be refused.

The questions of acquiescence and the Statute of Limitations constitute no defense.

I. As to the Statute of Limitations, see—

II. As to acquiescence.

The mere fact that the owner of the premises did not take legal proceedings to prevent the defendants from building their road, as they claimed to be authorized to do by various Acts of the Legislature, is no evidence of acquiescence.

Platt v. Platt, 58 N. Y. 646; Sixth Ave. R. Co. v. Gilbert Eler. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 430, 3 Abb. N. C. 372.

Mere failure to institute proceedings to restrain or prevent the construction or continued operation of the railroad, cannot deprive an owner of the constitutional right to recover compensation for the taking of his property, and to enjoin the continuance of the wrongful act until such compensation shall be made, unless the right is barred by the Statute of Limitations, or unless the defendants have in some legal manner acquired a title to the property taken, or unless the owner is equitably estopped from asserting his claim.

The defendants can never acquire a right by prescription to obstruct the easements in question.

Broiestedt v. South Side R. Co. 55 N. Y. 220; American Bank Note Co. v. Manhattan Eler. R. Co. 37 N. Y. S. R. 885.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is one of the usual actions in equity to restrain the defendants from further maintaining and operating an elevated street railroad on Sixth Avenue, in the City of New York, adjacent to the plaintiff's property, thereby unlawfully interfering with it. This property consisted of five vacant lots, extending about 125 feet along the easterly side of the avenue, between Fifty-seventh and Fifty-eighth Streets, and was acquired by the plaintiff by purchase in and previous to 1871. The defendant, the Metropolitan Elevated Railway Company, commenced and completed the structure of its railroad between the months of January and July, 1878, and from the time of its completion to the commencement of this action, in 1889, it has, either by itself or through its lessee, the Manhattan Railway Company, continued to maintain and operate an elevated steam railroad in front of and adjoining the plaintiff's premises on Sixth Avenue. No proceedings were taken by the railroad to acquire the easements of the abutting owners in the avenue, or their consent to its construction. The plaintiff complained that by reason of the operation of such railroad, in impairing the easements of light, air, and access to his premises, he had been damaged, and demanded judgment for such damages as well as a perpetual injunction against the defendant from further operating and maintaining their railroad in front of his premises. A trial was had at special term and the court declined to award pecuniary damages to the plaintiff, but rendered judgment granting the relief by injunction unless the defendants should pay to the plaintiff, within a limited time, the sum of $20,000 as the depreciation of the value of the premises caused by the railroad, and upon such payment being made required the plaintiff to execute to the defendants a conveyance of the easements. The depreciation in the value of plaintiff's property by reason of the erection and maintenance of the railroad was found by the trial court to be $20,000, and the evidence supported that finding. It was also found that the plaintiff saw the railroad in the course of construction in front of his premises, and, from time to time, saw what defendants were doing in respect thereto, and occasionally as a passenger rode upon it. He subscribed money to pay for counsel to prevent the erection of the road, but made no protest otherwise and instituted no legal proceedings to enjoin its construction or operation prior to the commencement of this action. It was also found that, after the commencement of the action, but before the trial, the defendants instituted proceedings for the condemnation of that part of the easements referred to which had been taken for the use of such railroads, and that such proceedings were pending, undetermined, at the time of the trial. The defendants requested the trial court to find the following propositions of law: First, "that this action is barred by the Statute of Limitations;" and, second, "that plaintiff's alleged right of action is barred by his acquiescence in said railroad and its operation, and his use thereof as a passenger," and that he is estopped from maintaining the action. The court refused to find as requested, and it is conceded by the defendants that the exceptions to such refusal raise the only questions to be considered on this appeal.

It is claimed that the ten-year Statute of Limitations commenced to run against an equity action from the time the plaintiff was first entitled to commence such action, and, that period having elapsed, that the plaintiff was barred from maintaining such action by section 388 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This section is the general statute adopted in the Code as a precautionary measure to cover cases inadvertently omitted or otherwise unprovided for. The general right of an abutting owner on a public street to recover damages for an unlawful invasion of his easements by the erection and maintenance of an elevated railroad in the street adjoining his premises is not contested by the defendants; nor is the liability of the defendants to make compensation to the plaintiff for the injury inflicted upon his property by the construction and operation of their railroad disputed, or his right to maintain successive actions at law to recover damages for the injury to his easements; but it is claimed that he has lost the right to proceed in equity, not only by reason of the Statute of Limitations, but also by virtue of an equitable estoppel arising out of the alleged acquiescence in the admitted trespasses. The case, therefore, involves the question how far, if at all, the owner has forfeited his rights in his property by reason of his alleged laches and inaction during the period of eleven years intervening between the construction of the road and the commencement of the action.

We think it would be impossible to sustain this appeal without unsettling the established law of the State. It is, in effect, an effort to exempt actions in equity from the operation of the well-settled principle, that trespasses upon real property, effected by an unlawful structure or nuisance, are continuous in their nature, and give successive causes of action from time to time, as the injuries are perpetrated. The questions raised are answered by elementary principles established in this State by numerous reported cases. They are found in the two propositions that continuous injuries to real estate caused by the maintenance of a nuisance or other unlawful structure create separate causes of action, barred only by the running of the Statute against the successive trespasses; and the further principle that no lapse of time or inaction merely, on the part of the plaintiff during the erection and maintenance of such structure, unless it has continued for the length of time necessary to effect a change of title in the property claimed to have been injured, is sufficient to defeat the right of the owner to damages. It may be that there is no case where the precise question as to the application of section 388 to such causes of action has been directly decided in this State; but the rule follows as a logical conclusion from the cases, and it affords a strong argument against the appellant's theory that, in the numerous cases in this State in which the question has been involved the point has never before been taken by counsel for the trespasser in any case in this court. It is not claimed here that the plaintiff has ceased to be the owner of the easements impaired, or that any other party has acquired title thereto, but it is argued that he has lost the right to employ the equitable power of the courts, by reason of his neglect to demand it within ten years from the time when a cause of action accrued. Thus, although the wrongful acts may be continued and the owner subjected to irreparable injury, and his legal remedy may be either inadequate, or require that it should be sought through repeated and numerous actions at law, it is contended that the jurisdiction of an equity court shall be arrested at the very time when, in the interest of the public, the exercise of its power becomes the most apparent and necessary. This claim we think is altogether untenable. The right of abutting owners to damages for an invasion of their rights in the public streets is predicated upon the constitutional guaranties that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or have his property taken for public use without just compensation; and it necessarily follows that, so long as such person continues to be the owner of property and liable to be injured in respect thereto by the unlawful acts of others, he is entitled to invoke the protection of the fundamental law, without regard to the lapse of time that may occur before the commencement of legal proceedings, provided the remedy is claimed within the statutory period of limitation applicable to his legal right, or before adverse possession has barred his title to the property injured. Uline v. New York Cent. & H. R. Co. 101 N. Y. 98, 2 Cent. Rep. 116; Arnold v. Hudson River R. Co. 55 N. Y. 661; Colrick v. Swinburne, 105 N. Y. 503, 8 Cent. Rep. 701; Tallman v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 121 N. Y. 123, 8 L. R. A. 173.

The cause of action, both at law and equity, in such cases, arises out of the trespasses committed, and is based on the ownership of the property upon which the injuries are inflicted, and it is obvious that no cause of action can be barred while there is an outstanding legal cause of action for which the party has a legal remedy. The existence of a legal cause of action is not only a prerequisite to the maintenance of the equitable action, but is also the foundation of the jurisdiction which equity courts possess in respect to the subject matter. The questions presented have been so frequently considered and decided in this court, in analogous cases, adversely to the contention of the appellants, that they should no longer be the subject of controversy or debate. The learning and ability, however, with which the counsel for the appellants have pressed their case before us, have induced us to treat the questions argued at greater length than would otherwise have been thought necessary or proper, and we therefore indicate, briefly, the general theory upon which this court has proceeded in the determination of like questions. That theory is concisely expressed by Judge Earl in the Case of Tallman, supra. It was there said that, "when the defendant began to construct its railway in front of the plaintiff's lots, he could have commenced an action in equity against it, and restrained it until it had made compensation to him for the rights and easements which it took from him, or until it had acquired them by condemnation proceedings. In that way he would, at least in the theory of the law, have been indemnified for all the damage he would suffer by reason of the construction of the railway. Instead of taking his remedy by an equitable action at that time, he could have taken it at any time afterwards, during his ownership of the lots, with the same result. He was not, however, confined to his remedy by such an action. He could suffer the railway to be constructed, and then bring successive actions to recover damages to his lots caused by the construction, maintenance, and operation of the railway." In the Arnold Case it was held that an easement to carry water in a trunk over the land of another "was such an interest in land as could not be modified or discharged save by conveyance in writing or by operation of law; that it was property within the meaning of article 1, § 6, of the Constitution, and therefore could not, nor could any portion of it, be taken for public use without compensation;" and "that this right of enjoying such easement was a continuous one, and the unlawful preventing its exercise a continuous injury;" 13 L. R. A.

and that, therefore, the Statute of Limitations did not bar plaintiff's claim for the injuries sustained." It is now the settled law of this State that no action at law can be maintained by an owner to recover prospective damages for injuries inflicted upon real property, and it is equally certain, we think, that an equity action for that purpose alone cannot be sustained. Uline v. New York Cent. & H. R. R. Co. supra; Pond v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. 112 N. Y. 187.

Inasmuch as the equitable remedy depends, among other things, upon the existence of a legal cause of action, it follows that those facts which will bar the legal action will also afford an answer to the equitable remedy, and that so long as a legal remedy exists an equity court is open to aid in the enforcement of the legal claim. Where the trespass is of such a character that it may be discontinued, at the option of the wrong-doer, or, if continued, is susceptible of having legal sanction obtained for its continuance, it seems offensive to our sense of right that a wrong-doer should be permitted to allege that his intention to repeat and continue his own unlawful conduct should deprive the owner of any of the remedies which the law has provided for his protection. If it were otherwise, the wrong-doer would be permitted to show the aggravated character of his own conduct as a defense to the action of the legal owner, and thus violate the rule of law as well as the plainest principles of equity. Upon settled principles, a court of equity had unquestioned jurisdiction, by reason of the continuance of the legal right and the inadequacy of the legal remedy, to render the judgment pronounced in this case by the trial court. Henderson's Case, 78 N. Y. 423; Tallman's Case, supra.

That successive causes of action have accrued to the owner for each day's maintenance and operation of the railroad structure adjoining his premises is undisputable, and that he is entitled to recover some damages for each trespass, even though it be nominal only, is equally undeniable. Colrick v. Swinburne, supra. The plaintiff may delay his action, and join together such causes of action as have not been outlawed, or he may bring an action daily, and recover such damages as he can establish. Baldwin v. Calkins, 10 Wend. 167. In the case of unoccupied lands, these damages may be small, but by delay the owner may lose them altogether, and in the mean while his toleration may be laying the foundation of an adverse claim to the property itself, and thus be the cause to him of irreparable injury. While it is indispensable to the protection of his rights that he should assert them before his right is barred, in such case it may not be to his interest to do so as often or as promptly as when his damages are large and immediate; but no bar is available against his laches unless it continues until the legal action is barred. The jurisdiction of equity arises by reason of the necessity of repeated actions at law to redress the owner's grievance, and must, from the nature of the case, continue so long as that necessity exists. The existence of either of the grounds of equity jurisdiction referred to is sufficient to maintain an action, but they in fact are all present here, and indicate the propriety of the judgment appealed from. It was said by Judge Earl, in Campbell v. Seaman, 68 N. Y. 582, that "the right to an injunction, in a proper case, in England and most of the States, is just as fixed and certain as the right to any other provisional remedy. The writ can rightfully be demanded to prevent irreparable injury, interminable litigation, and a multiplicity of suits, and its refusal in a proper case would be error to be corrected by a proper tribunal." The lapse, therefore, of six years after a trespass has been committed upon real estate bars not only the legal action, but also constitutes a practical defense to an equitable action founded upon the necessity of numerous legal actions to obtain redress; because the right to such redress has, as to such wrongs, expired. But, if the trespasses are continued after that period, new causes of action arise, unbarred by any rule of law or equity, which are cognizable not only at law, but also in equity. Utine's Case, supra.

Section 388 of the Code finds its true interpretation when applied to causes of action founded upon equitable rights alone, or cases not specified in the general Statutes of Limitation. It being conceded, as to legal causes of action for trespass and nuisance, that the injuries thereby occasioned are continuous, and arise from time to time as fresh trespasses are committed, it is difficult to see why the same principle should not apply with at least equal force and propriety to equitable actions. Indeed, it is obvious that it should be held to apply with greater reason to the latter, since otherwise the equity jurisdiction would be practically subverted. While the appellants' contention would permit the equity jurisdiction to be preserved for ten years, it precludes its exercise forever thereafter, and leaves the evils of incessant litigation to harass the public for practically an unlimited period of time. It would seem, therefore, that it is immaterial, either in equity or at law, whether the injuries done to the owner's property were originally intended by the wrong-doer to be perpetual, and of a permanent character, or were of a temporary nature only, and occasional in their operation. The law makes no distinction in the character of the injury, but prescribes one uniform principle for redress, without regard to the nature of the remedy pursued. Krehl v. Burrell, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 146; Henderson's Case, supra; Baldwin v. Calkins, 10 Wend. 170; Williams v. New York Cent. R. Co. 16 N. Y. 111.

The defendants' chief contention is that the relief in equity, as now given against elevated railroads for invasions of the rights of abutting owners in streets, is, practically, an action to recover permanent damages for such injuries, and that, therefore, the Statute of Limitations should commence to run from the time when any cause of action arose. There would be some force in this argument were that the real character of the action or if the equity courts had assumed to exercise the power of awarding damages on that theory, but we know of no instance in which they have done so in this State. The action here is, neither in practice or theory, an action of such a character, and by its fundamental rules, as well as the constitutional requirement that compensation for such property shall be assessed by a jury or commission alone, an equity court is incapacitated from entertaining actions instituted for the purpose of recovering damages alone. Bradley v. Bosley, 1 Barb. Ch. 125, 5 L. ed. 324; Morse v. Elmendorf, 11 Paige, 277, 5 L. ed. 185; art. 1, § 7, Const. A court of law is the exclusive tribunal for the determination of such actions.

We have been referred to no case in this State where an equity court has assumed the authority to render judgment for prospective damages against a wrong-doer, and we think, in the nature of the jurisdiction of such courts, a suit brought for such a purpose alone is not authorized. To say, therefore, that an action, in which the plaintiff has no legal right to demand permanent damages and the court owes no legal duty to award them, affords the owner an adequate remedy for such damages, is to pervert the plain character of the action. While equity courts have frequently suspended the remedy, as they did in this case, by injunction upon conditions, as for a specified time or until the wrong-doer has been afforded an opportunity to condemn the property invaded, or has satisfied the owner's damages, they have never, to our knowledge, rendered judgment for such damages, or authorized the collection thereof by the owner. The privilege of securing the right to continue the trespasses complained of has, when authorized, been granted as an act of grace and favor to the offending party and not as matter of right to the injured owner. As was said in the Henderson Case, "equitable relief is awarded, not, as the defendant's counsel claims, by way of menace or as a means of compelling the payment of money, but that the defendant may desist from an unauthorized use of the plaintiffs' property, and forbear from any further interference with their rights." Equity courts can, by virtue of their power to grant specific relief, obviate the difficulty attending an action at law in giving permanent damages for an injury to real property, by providing that a title to the easements required shall be conveyed as a condition of the relief granted. The court, having the authority to grant a perpetual injunction, does not impair its exercise of such authority by permitting the offender to escape its effect by voluntarily paying the owner for the property injured. It is thus left optional with the trespasser to remedy the wrong done by him or to suffer the judgment of the court to stand. While the injury inflicted upon the wrong-doer by neglect to comply with the conditions may be so onerous, in many cases, as to inflict great loss upon him, it nevertheless does no more than to place in his hands the means of escaping from the disastrous consequences of a judgment which has been rendered imperative by his own wrongful conduct. A party who voluntarily prosecutes a public enterprise for his own benefit, without regard to the legal rights of individuals who may be damaged by its operation, must always run a great risk of being placed in a dangerous situation through his unlawful conduct; but this is the result of his own volition, and the injury which necessarily follows such action cannot lawfully be imposed upon the parties injured without disregarding the constitutional provisions intended for their protection. It furnishes no cause of complaint to the wrong-doer that the court, having power to restrain him altogether from continuing his trespasses, should mitigate the severity of its judgment by authorizing him to repeat them upon complying with special conditions prescribed by the judgment, so long as it is left to his election to perform them or not.

A consideration of the cases generally, in which equity courts have exercised the power of giving damages as an incident of the equitable relief granted, seems to be unnecessary in this case, as such courts in this State have not in this class of actions, so far as we know, assumed to exercise that power. The cases cited by the appellants to sustain the authority of an equity court to award permanent damages to real property were those of foreign jurisdiction where special statutes existed, or those in which no constitutional provision requiring such damages to be assessed by a jury or commissioners were in force. Here such a requirement exists, and the courts decline to assess such damages, but simply say to the corporations, "You may escape the legal consequences of your conduct by complying with certain conditions, as, for instance, by paying the plaintiff a specified sum of money." This sum may represent the actual depreciation in the value of the plaintiff's property, or the amount of damages already suffered, or any other arbitrary sum. The defendant, who has an option to pay it or not, at his own will, cannot justly complain of the action of the court. The option is given to the defendant, and not to the plaintiff. His remedy is confined to his injunction. The injury which results to the defendant, in case the option is not accepted, results from the judgment rendered by the court, and not from his neglect to make payment. The expression, made use of in some of the cases, to the effect that "the only remedy, whereby just compensation for the property taken can be compelled, is an action to restrain the continuous trespasses" (Pond v. Metropolitan Elec. R. Co. 112 N. Y. 186; Tallman Case, supra), means simply that an injured party can by that means secure the enjoyment of his property, unless the wrong-doer, by making compensation, in some form, for the injury inflicted, has acquired the lawful right to continue it. In this sense only, they may be, not incorrectly, called actions to compel the payment of damages.

The defendants also urge as a reason why the Statute of Limitations should bar this action, that otherwise they will be embarrassed in their efforts to secure a right by prescription. We ascribe but little weight to this suggestion. The law applies a period of limitation to actions for the public benefit. They are termed "statutes of reform," and are founded upon the maxim, interest reipublice ut sit finis litium. They are not intended for the benefit of wrong-doers, and while the law tolerates and protects title acquired by prescription, when clearly made out, it does not favor or encourage that mode of acquiring property.

We are therefore of the opinion that the right to bring an equity action to restrain continuous trespasses upon real estate is not barred in ten years from the time of the original trespass, but may be sustained, if brought at any time, so long as the plaintiff has title to the property injured, and a cause of action for such injuries is not barred at law. But the defendants, failing to establish the bar of the Statute of Limitations, still insist that the affiliated principle of acquiescence constitutes a defense to the action. There is no foundation in the case for a claim that the plaintiff's conduct amounted to an estoppel, and, indeed, the claim is not seriously urged by the appellants. It is obvious that such conduct has never led the defendants into a line of action which they would not otherwise have pursued, or encouraged them to expend money or make improvements by reason of their reliance upon the alleged inaction or acquiescence of the plaintiff. They inaugurated their enterprise in the face of persistent opposition by the plaintiff and other abutting owners, and carried it to completion while earnest efforts were being made to prevent them. From the inception of the enterprise to the present time, the claim has been made that the defendants had no right to build their road in the streets of New York without compensating the abutting owners for the damages inflicted upon their property, and the defendants have continued the prosecution of their purpose regardless of their legal liability, and in the face of strenuous opposition, with an apparent intention to wholly ignore the claims of such owners. The judicial annals of the State are filled with the history of the litigations which have sprung out of the efforts of the elevated railroad companies to appropriate the property of the citizens of New York to the benefit of such railroads without compensation. In view of these facts, it is idle to claim that such companies have been induced, in any respect, to prosecute their enterprises in reliance upon the assumed acquiescence of the owners. Boardman v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 84 N. Y. 181. The building and completion of their road in this case occurred in the first half of 1878, and before the numerous parties concerned could have been fully awake to the real consequences of the enterprise. So far as the permanent structure is concerned, their expenditures were all incurred within six months, and while the parties were making earnest efforts to stay any expenditures. The case is entirely destitute of proofs showing the existence of any elements of estoppel, and the defendants are therefore driven to rely, in this respect, upon the mere inaction of the plaintiff to prosecute his claim. This claim comes with little grace from parties who have for a much longer period neglected to take proceedings to acquire the real ownership of the property required by them in the prosecution of their enterprise. But this question we also think is governed by authority equally conclusive with that relating to the Statute of Limitations. The doctrine of acquiescence as a defense to an equity action has been generally limited here to those of an equitable nature exclusively, or to cases where the legal right has expired, or the party has lost his right of property by prescription or adverse possession. Whatever may be the rule in other States, it can be said that here no period of inaction merely has been held sufficient to justify a nuisance or trespass, unless it has continued for such a length of time as will authorize the presumption of a grant. The principle that so long as the legal right exists the owner is entitled to maintain his action in equity to restrain violation of this right has been uniformly applied in this court. Tallman v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. and Arnold v. Hudson River R. Co. supra; Broistedt v. South Side R. Co. Long Island, 55 N. Y. 220; Campbell v. Seaman, supra; Ormsby v. Vermont Copper Min. Co. 56 N. Y. 623; Haight v. Price, 21 N. Y. 240; Viele v. Judson, 83 N. Y. 32; New York Rubber Co. v. Rothery, 107 N. Y. 310, 9 Cent. Rep. 827; Chapman v. Rochester, 110 N. Y. 273, 1 L. R. A. 296.

In the Case of Ormsby, as appears by the head-note, it was held that "the doctrine of laches and acquiescence, as a bar to an action through lapse of time, finds its just application in respect to equitable rights only. As to legal rights, mere lapse of time, before an action to enforce them, is of no moment, unless it comes up to the requirements of the Statute of Limitations." In the Chapman Case, this court held that the silence and inaction of the plaintiff while seeing the defendant construct sewers and spend large sums of money in completing a sewage system, which discharged the filth of the city into a stream belonging to the plaintiff, did not constitute a defense to an action for an injunction, no matter how long continued, unless accompanied by circumstances amounting to an estoppel. It was held in Haight v. Price "that no acquiescence short of twenty years repels the presumption that the diversion of a water-course was in hostility to the rights of the riparian proprietors, or authorizes the presumption either of a grant or of license." Judge Earl, in the Campbell Case, said: "It is claimed that the plaintiffs so far acquiesced in this nuisance as to bar them from equitable relief. I do not perceive how any acquiescence short of twenty years can bar one from complaining of a nuisance, unless his conduct has been such as to estop him. . . . No act or omission of theirs induced the defendant to incur large expenses, or to take any action which could be the basis of an estoppel against them, and therefore there was no acquiescence or laches which should bar the plaintiffs within any rule laid down in any reported case. In Viele v. Judson, Judge Finch, in speaking of the cases where acquiescence had been held a bar, says: "In all of these the silence operated as a fraud, and actually itself misled. In all there was both the specific opportunity and apparent duty to speak, and in all the party maintaining silence knew that someone was relying upon that silence, and either acting or about to act as he would not have done had the truth been told." It was held in the Broistedt Case that the possession by a railroad company of a highway, under a license given by statute, is presumed to be subordinate to the rights of the owner of the soil, and cannot be said to be adverse to him. In New York Rubber Co. v. Rothery the defendant had built expensive structures for manufacturing purposes, and diverted the water from a stream adjoining plaintiff's premises for the purpose of supplying power to his machinery. It was claimed that the plaintiff, by her silence during the period when this work was going on, was barred of her action for damages. Judge Peckham, writing in the case, says: "In this there was no element of an estoppel. To constitute it, the person sought to be estopped must do some act or make some admission with an intention of influencing the conduct of another, or that he had reason to believe would influence his conduct, and which act or omission is inconsistent with the claim he proposes now to make. The other party, too, must have acted upon the strength of such admission or conduct." See also McMurray v. McMurray, 66 N. Y. 176.

But we have already referred to a sufficient number of cases in this court to show how uniformly and frequently we have adhered to the doctrine, where a legal right is involved, and, upon grounds of equity jurisdiction, the courts have been called upon to sustain the legal right, that the mere laches of a party, unaccompanied by circumstances amounting to an estoppel, constitutes no defense to such an action. Such is also the doctrine, generally, of the elementary writers. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 817; Bigelow, Estoppel, p. 476 et seq. The same general principle has also been held in England. In the case of Fullwood v. Fullwood, L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 176, Fry, J., says that "mere lapse of time unaccompanied by anything else, has, in my judgment, just as much effect, and no more, in barring a suit for an injunction, as it has in barring an action for deceit." And the head note in Re Maddener, L. R. 27 Ch. Div. 523, reads: "That, as the plaintiff was coming to enforce a legal right, his mere delay to take proceedings was no defense, as it had not continued long enough to bar his legal right; the case standing on a different footing from a suit to set aside, on equitable grounds, a deed which was valid at law." The Supreme Court of the United States has also laid down the same rule in the recent case of Menendez v. Holt, 128 U. S. 523, 32 L. ed. 528, where Chief Justice Fuller, writing for the court, says: "Mere delay or acquiescence cannot defeat the remedy by injunction in support of the legal right, unless it has been continued so long and under such circumstances as to defeat the right itself. Hence, upon an application to stay waste, relief will not be refused on the ground that, as the defendant had been allowed to cut down half the trees upon the complainant's land, he had acquired, by that negligence, the right to cut down the remainder. Atty-Gen. v. Eastlake, 11 Hare, 205."

Even in case where laches has been allowed to operate as a defense, the question is to be determined in the discretion of the court, upon all of the circumstances of the case. Fullwood v. Fullwood, supra.

There is nothing in the history of this case which induces us to suppose the court committed any error in the exercise of their discretion in granting the injunction appealed from. The plaintiff had reason to suppose the defendants would discontinue their trespasses, or, if they were continued, they would resort to legal means to justify them. They had no reason to believe that the defendants deliberately intended to prosecute their enterprise, altogether regardless of the legal rights of others, and were justified in delaying a reasonable time, in expectation that the defendants would eventually do justice to those whose property they were appropriating to their own use. The novelty of the questions presented; the vast number of people who were suffering similar injuries; the importance of the projected road for the public convenience,—were all circumstances addressed to the discretion of the court upon the question of laches, and presented strong reasons why a strict rule should not be applied to the delay of the injured parties in seeking redress in this and similar cases. The rule requiring promptness in soliciting the intervention of a court of equity is always addressed to the discretion of the court, and varies much according to the situation of the parties, the nature of the relief demanded, and the circumstances of the case. Calhoun v. Millard, 121 N. Y. 82, 8 L. R. A. 248; Fullwood v. Fullwood, supra; Rayner v. Pearsall, 3 Johns. Ch. 578, 1 L. ed. 728; Atwater v. Fowler, 1 Edw. Ch. 420, 6 L. ed. 194. What might be considered an unjustifiable delay in one case would be considered reasonable in another, and an equity court which should refuse its aid to a party in protecting a legal right, without a valid and sufficient reason, would be subject to the criticism of shutting the doors of the temple of justice in the face of meritorious suitors, and condemning them to suffer remediless wrongs. The fact that the defendants intended to make their structure permanent, or made it so in fact, constitutes no defense to the action. Krehl v. Burrell, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 551, on appeal, L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 146.

For the reasons stated, we think the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

1. A judgment duly entered in one State on a warrant of attorney is as conclusive

NOTE.—Judgments confessed on warrants of attorney; conclusiveness.

A judgment confessed on a warrant of attorney has the same force as any other. Keith v. Kellogg, 97 Ill. 147.

In what cases authorized.

The practice of entering judgment in debt on warrants of attorney is very old, so old that the date of its origin is unknown. 2 Chitty, Pr. 234.

A warrant of attorney may authorize confession of judgment on a note. Parker v. Poole, 12 Tex. 86.

In an early English case the use of such warrants in ejectment was involved and it was held that ejectment is not a "personal" action within the meaning of a Statute requiring the presence of an attorney in such actions on the entry of judgment on a warrant. Doe v. Kingston, 1 Dowl. P. C. N. S. 263.

Soon after by the same court a judgment on a warrant of attorney was allowed in ejectment. Doe v. Beaumont, 2 Dowl. P. C. N. S. 972.

Judgment upon a warrant of attorney contained in a lease cannot be entered in an action of forcible detainer, but is coram non judge and void as the statutory proceeding in such cases is exclusive. 13 L. R. A.

in all other States as in the State where it is entered.

2. Jurisdiction to render a judgment on a note containing a warrant of attorney to confess judgment may be acquired by the appearance of the party's authorized agent.

3. The entry of judgment on a note containing a warrant of attorney to confess judgment may be made before maturity of the note.

(October 6, 1861.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Superior Court for the City of New York, affirming a judgment of the Trial Term in favor of plaintiff in an action upon a foreign judgment. Affirmed.

The judgment upon which the suit was brought was confessed by the prothonotary of the court of common pleas in which the judgment was entered, and the record of the judgment was as follows:

"Continuance Docket Entry of December Term, 1877.

Lewis M. Teel

v.

Abraham Yost,

—d. s. b., $2,268 00. And now Jan'y 14, 1878, a single bill, under the hand and seal of the defendant, dated Jan'y 12, 1878, wherein he promises to pay to the plaintiff or order, one year after date, twenty-two hundred and sixty-eight dollars, containing a clause authorizing the entry of judgment, waiving stay of execution, with ten per cent for collection fees, is produced hereto, to have judgment entered thereon.

"Wherefore judgment."

Mr. Lemuel Skidmore, for appellant:

The alleged judgment record shows that there was nothing offered to the Pennsylvania court as the basis of a judicial decision. It is in the nature of a mere memorandum by the clerk, and does not amount to a judgment.

Cromwell v. Bank of Pittsburgh, 2 Wall. Jr. 584.

The alleged record here shows that the defendant was not in any way summoned or notified, and there is no waiver by him of such notification.

French v. Willer, 2 L. R. A. 717, 126 Ill. 611, overruling Johnson v. Crane, 22 Ill. App. 366; Links v. Mayer, 22 Ill. App. 430.

The words "warrant of attorney" in the Pennsylvania Act of April 4, 1877, authorizing an appeal from a decision as to opening judgments thereon, do not refer to anything but money judgments. Swartz's App. 11 Cent. Rep. 681, 119 Pa. 206; Limberty v. Jones, 11 Cent. Rep. 672, 118 Pa. 589; Blythe Twp. v. Morris (Pa.) 11 Cent. Rep. 660.

Form and validity of warrants.

A warrant of attorney need not be by deed but must have an attesting witness. Kennerley v. Mussen, 5 Taunt. 264.

It need not be under seal. Kneedler's App. 92 Pa. 428.

But the authority of an attorney to confess a judgment, where there is nothing on the record to show that it is by virtue of a warrant of attorney need not be in writing. Limberty v. Jones, 11 Cent. Rep. 672, 118 Pa. 589.

A warrant of attorney "to enter" judgment is sufficient to authorize a confession. Mason v. Smith, 8 Ind. 73.

It is not within the clause of the Constitution of the United States requiring full faith and credit to be given in each State to the judicial proceedings of another State, because it is not in any sense a judicial proceeding within the meaning of the Constitution or the Act of Congress of 1790.

Thurber v. Blackburne, 1 N. H. 242; Doughty v. Doughty, 28 N. J. Eq. 585.

The power of attorney, if not void for indefiniteness, is of an attorney in fact, and therefore special and limited, and must be strictly pursued.

Baldwin v. Freyendall, 10 Ill. App. 106.

The law plainly does not authorize entry of judgment for an amount not appearing to be due.

The plain and reasonable sense of the word "due" is payable immediately.

Allen v. Patterson, 7 N. Y. 476.

No practice ever existed at common law, before the enactment of this Statute, of entering judgment upon a note or other obligation before it was by its terms payable.

3 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 669; Allen v. Smillie, 1 Abb. Pr. 354.

That Statute did not intend to authorize the prothonotary to enter judgment in a case wherein no judgment could have previously been entered by "the agency of an attorney," and by "declaration filed." No declaration could have been founded upon the promissory note in the present case before it was due and payable, according to its terms.

Nicholl v. Bromley, 2 Brod. & B. 464.

From the statements of judges in the Pennsylvania cases, it appears that prothonotaries are generally men ignorant of law, some of them totally uneducated; and that no uniform routine prevails among them, but each one does what seems best in his own eyes; also that a summary mode of rectifying their mistakes exists by ex parte application to a judge at chambers.

Lewis v. Smith, 2 Serg. & R. 142; Holden v. Bull, 1 Penn. & W. 460.

It would be absurd to predicate a rule of law upon the doings of such men, contrary to the plain meaning of the statute under which they profess to act, or to hold that the courts of our State are required to give to such loose proceedings the character of a judgment.

Messrs. Edward Lyman Short, Samuel Blythe Rogers, and John C. Thomson, for respondent:

The defendant, being domiciled in Pennsylvania at the time the judgment was entered there, was bound personally by the judgment, provided it was rendered in accordance with the laws of that State.

Ruger, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action upon a judgment, and the question involved is whether the record in evidence constituted a valid judgment, in another State, by confession. In the case of such a judgment it is, of course, unnecessary that any process should be issued or served, declaration filed, or personal appearance entered by the defendant; as these proceedings are totally inconsistent with the nature of a judgment by confession. The appearance by an attorney, under a written power from the party, authorizing his consent to a judgment, is the legal equivalent of the process and proceedings usually taken in an action in initium. In all such cases it is simply a question as to what the principal has authorized to be done in his name, and does not involve any of the questions arising in an action in invitum against resident or nonresident defendants. The judgment sued upon purported to have been rendered by the Court of Common Pleas of the State of Pennsylvania on the 14th day of January, 1878, in favor of the plaintiff, Lewis M. Teel, and against the defendant, Abraham Yost, for $2,268, d. s. b., or as upon debt without process. It was entered upon an instrument, filed in the records of the court, reading as follows:

"One year after date I promise to pay Lewis M. Yost twenty-two hundred and sixty-eight dollars, without defalcation, for value received. And I do hereby authorize any attorney of any court of record in Pennsylvania or elsewhere to confess judgment therefor, and release of errors, and I do hereby waive all stay of execution from and after the maturity of the above note. Witness my hand and seal the day and date above written, with ten per cent allowed for collection fees, with interest from date. "Abraham Yost. [L. s.]

"Witness present: Geo. Ziegenfuss."

This instrument is usually called a "judgment note,"—an obligation quite common in the State of Pennsylvania. The parties to the note were both residents of that State, and had been so for a long time previous to and after the rendition of the judgment, and the court of common pleas was a court of general jurisdiction in that State, of which the prothonotary was clerk, and had charge of its records, and authority to enter judgments by confession.

If the court in Pennsylvania had jurisdiction of the person of the defendant and the subject matter of the action, whatever course it might afterwards have pursued in determining the rights of the parties, they cannot be heard now to re-litigate the questions considered in that action. As to such matter, upon the principle of res adjudicata, the judgment is binding and conclusive upon the parties. If this was a valid judgment under the laws of the State where it was rendered, it must, under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress, be accorded the same force and effect in this State that it had in the State where rendered. Section 1, art. 4, Const. U. S.; Rev. Stat. U. S. § 905.

The rule laid down in Shumway v. Stillman, 6 Wend. 458, was "that the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction, in any State in the Union, is equally conclusive upon the parties in all the other States as in the State in which it was rendered. This, however, is subject to two qualifications: first, if it appears by the record that the defendant was not served with process, and did not appear in person or by attorney, such judgment is void; and, second, if it appears by the record that the defendant appeared by attorney, the defendant may disprove the authority of such attorney to appear for him." This case has been quite uniformly cited and approved as a leading case in subsequent cases in this State. Under the authority of this rule, we do not see how the defendant could have been seriously prejudiced by the want of notice of the proceedings leading to the judgment, as it was competent for him

Richards v. Barlow, 1 New Eng. Rep. 577, 140 Mass. 218.

A warrant to confess a judgment at any time "after the date" of a note which is on demand will not authorize judgment on the same day. Waterman v. Jones, 28 Ill. 54; White v. Jones, 38 Ill. 150.

But it is otherwise where judgment is authorized "at any time hereafter." Thomas v. Mueller, 106 Ill. 36.

Power to enter judgment on notes for such sum "as may appear to be unpaid" will not authorize a judgment until the notes are due. Sloane v. Anderson, 57 Wis. 123; Reid v. Southworth, 71 Wis. 238.

Power to enter judgment on such warrants before the maturity of the note must be given in clear and precise language. Reid v. Southworth, supra.

On entry of appearance one day earlier than is authorized by the power of attorney the judgment will be void for lack of jurisdiction. White v. Jones, supra.

Contingencies; unadjusted equities or claims.

A warrant to confess judgment for "any rent which may be due by the terms of this lease" is void under a statute authorizing confession for a debt justly due if the amount of the rent under the lease is contingent. Little v. Dyer (Ill.) June 15, 1891.

The equities must first be adjusted before judgment can be entered on an instrument making the liability depend on contingencies and equities between the parties. Dilley v. Van Wie, 6 Wis. 200.

Unless the amount due can be ascertained from the face of the instrument, the prothonotary cannot enter judgment on it under the Pennsylvania Act of 1806. Conway v. Halstead, 73 Pa. 354.

But he can enter judgment on a contract for payment in annual installments, as he can ascertain prima facie the amount from the face of the instrument itself and the indorsements thereon. Whitney v. Hopkins, 135 Pa. 246.

For what amount; variance; misdescription.

Entry of judgment for the amount of a note, where the complaint claims much larger damages, and the plea of confession admits that the larger amount is due, is not valid. Tucker v. Gill, 61 Ill. 226.

Judgment can be entered only for the sum actually due, although the warrant of attorney authorizes it for the "sum appearing to be due." Dilley v. Van Wie, 6 Wis. 200; Sloane v. Anderson, 57 Wis. 123.

A judgment is not entirely void because entered on a warrant of attorney for an excessive amount. Davenport v. Wright, 51 Pa. 202.

The debtor only can complain that the amount of a judgment entered on a warrant of attorney is excessive. It cannot be attacked for that reason by a creditor. Adam v. Arnold, 86 Ill. 185.

A judgment confessed under a warrant of attorney in a tax collector's bond must be for the whole penal sum, and one for less will be stricken off with leave to enter one for the whole amount. Com. v. Evans, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 665.

An attorney's fee may be included in a judgment entered by warrant of attorney where the fee is fixed by the warrant, but the attorney has no authority to fix it. Campbell v. Goddard, 5 West. Rep. 129, 117 Ill. 251.

Power to confess judgment on a note of a certain date will not sustain a judgment on a note of a different date, although it is claimed that there was a mistake in writing the date. Chase v. Dana, 44 Ill. 262.

A mere misdescription of the "foregoing note," which is on the same paper, as to the time when to show in defense of this action that the power of attorney upon which the judgment proceeded was a forgery, and conferred no authority upon anyone to appear for him and confess judgment thereon; but no such proof was given or offered upon the trial. The presumption, therefore, is that the note was the genuine obligation of the defendant, and gave actual authority to the prothonotary, or any other attorney, to consent to the judgment authorized by it.

Several objections are raised to the recovery in this action, some of them going to the form of the judgment, and others assailing the jurisdiction of the court to render it; but we are of the opinion that none of them are well founded. It was found by the trial court, as a question of fact, that said "judgment was duly rendered and entered according to the laws of Pennsylvania. It is, and was by the laws of Pennsylvania, a valid, binding adjudication, in personam, against the defendant herein, and entitled, by the laws of said State, to have the same faith and credit given to it as if it had been entered upon a verdict after a trial in which the defendant had appeared." A finding of law to the same effect was made by the court, and it is upon exceptions to these two findings that the questions in the case arise. These findings were amply supported by the evidence, and unless, therefore, it appears that some error of law was committed by the court on the trial, the judgment must be sustained. The evidence leaves no room for doubt but that this was considered in form and substance a valid judgment, in personam, in the State where it was rendered, and constituted a "judgment," within the meaning of the Acts of Congress requiring faith and credit to be given to it in other States. The reasons for this conclusion are so well stated in the opinions of the supreme court of that State that we shall content ourselves with reference to two reported cases only.

It was said in the case of Helvetia v. Rapp, 7 Serg. & R. 306: "The evident and sole intention of the Legislature in conferring the power of entering a judgment on the judgment bond, without the intervention of an attorney, was to exempt the obligor from the payment of costs to an attorney. This Act was passed on the 24th of February, 1806. It provided that the prothonotary of any court of record, on the application of the original holder, or his assignee, of a bond, note, or other instrument, on which judgment is confessed, or containing a warrant of attorney to confess a judgment, interest runs, is immaterial. Osgood v. Blackmore, 50 Ill. 261.

A misdescription in the declaration on a sealed note, payable at a particular place, describing it as an unsealed note payable generally, will not make the judgment void. Adam v. Arnold, 86 Ill. 185.

Proof necessary.

After a year and a day a judgment cannot be entered on a warrant of attorney without leave of the court, and proof that the maker is still alive and an indebtedness still due. Hinds v. Hopkins, 28 Ill. 344; Lushington v. Waller, 1 H. Bl. 94; Anonymous, 6 Mod. 212; Manufacturers & M. Bank of Phila. v. St. John, 5 Hill, 497.

But failure of such proof is not alone sufficient to make the judgment void. Rising v. Brainard, 36 Ill. 79; Stuhl v. Shipp, 44 Ill. 133.

The record must show proof of the execution of the warrant of attorney. Gambia v. How, 8 Blackf. 133.

Also the nature of the liability. Ibid.

Failure to file proof of the execution of a power of attorney on the entry by a clerk of a court of record, in vacation, of a judgment by confession renders the judgment void for lack of jurisdiction. *Gardner v. shall enter judgment against the person or persons who executed the same, for the amount which, from the face of the instrument, appears to be due, without the agency of any attorney, or declaration filed, particularly entering on his docket the date and time of the writing, which shall have the same force and effect as if a declaration had been filed, and judgment had been confessed by an attorney, or given in open court in term time. . . . There being no literal form directed, and no precedent to guide the prothonotary in the exercise of this new duty, each has adopted his own mode. They are as various as their faces, and many of them scarcely present a feature to inform a purchaser or designate a judgment. But here is a substantial entry of a judgment bond, containing all that is necessary to give information. It is entered on the docket in the form of an action, as a judgment bond; the names of the parties; the amount due; the date and time of the writing. It states the entry of a judgment bond, and seal of the defendant. The judgment bond is filed of record, entered the 17th of May, 1815. What is entered? A judgment on the bond filed. No man could be deceived by this mode of entry; for, however inartificial it may be, however defective in the technical words of a judgment, none who called for information would be led into error. The docket entry gave full information. It might have been more formal, but still it is the entry of a judgment entered by the prothonotary, who was authorized to make the entry."

The head-note in the case of Com. v. Conard, 1 Rawle, 249, reads that "a prothonotary complies substantially with the directions of the Act of Assembly of the 24th of February, 1806, when, in entering judgment on a bond with warrant of attorney, upon the application of the party he enters on his docket the names of the obligor and obligee in the form of an action as parties, the date of the bond and warrant of attorney, the penal sum, the real debt, the time of entering the judgment, and the date of the judgment on the margin of the record." These clear and explicit announcements by the highest courts of the State, of the force and effect given to such judgments in that State, are entitled to the highest respect, and cannot, without ignoring the requirements of comity and propriety prevailing among sister States, be disregarded by the courts of other States. It should in any event be for the gravest reasons alone, and those demanded by the clearest rules of public policy and justice, that the courts of one State should deliberately deny to the decisions of the courts of another State the authority which they possess in the State where rendered. So far from the questions in this case being of that character, we are of the opinion that judgments by confession, in all material respects similar to the one under consideration, are not only valid judgments at common law, but have been authorized by the statute law of most of the States of the Union, and among others, by our own.

The principal claim made by the defendant on the argument of the case here was that the note did not authorize a confession of judgment upon it before it was due; but it was also claimed that the record produced did not constitute a judgment, inasmuch as it did not appear thereby that process was issued and served on the defendant, or declaration filed, or personal appearance made by him, or proof taken of the cause of action by the court, and therefore that it had no jurisdiction to render a judgment. We have already stated that in judgments by confession neither process, declaration, nor personal appearance are anywhere required in order to authorize the rendition of a valid personal judgment by a competent court. The appearance of the agent appointed by the party in his warrant of attorney upon the entry of the judgment constitutes, to every intent and purpose, an appearance by the party, and gives the court jurisdiction to render a judgment to the effect authorized against his principal.

We are also of the opinion that the entry of judgment, before the maturity of the note, was sanctioned, not only by the law of Pennsylvania, but by that of every other country where judgments by confession are permitted. The evidence in the case showed that it was the common practice in Pennsylvania to enter judgment on such notes at any time after their date, without respect to the time when they became due; but the prothonotary was not authorized to issue execution for their collection until, by the terms of the note, it became due. The cases of Com. v. Conard, 1 Rawle, 249; Montelius v. Montelius, 1 Brightly, 79, and Helbete v. Rapp, 7 Serg. & R. 306,—are examples of judgment on such notes; and in Cooper v. Shaver, 101 Pa. 547, an application to set aside the entry of judgment on a collateral obligation, guaranteeing the collection of a judgment with warrant of attorney, was denied, although no proof was given that an effort had been made by the plaintiff or that he was unable to collect the original judgment. In New Jersey where the practice of giving bonds and notes, with warrant of attorney, is similar to that prevailing in Pennsylvania, the court held that it was not error to enter a judgment by confession upon a note before it became payable.

In this case there is no restriction upon the authority of the attorney to confess judgment, and the waiver of a stay of execution after the maturity of the note constitutes an implied admission on the part of the defendant that judgment could be entered previous to that time. Under the former practice of entering judgments upon a warrant of attorney, it was uniformly held, in England and in this country, that where the warrant is given to secure the payment of money, it is not necessary that the plaintiff should delay the signing of judgment until default be made in the payment, unless there is some restriction as to the time of entry in the warrant. See Graham, Pr. 778, and cases cited. We are therefore of the opinion that the entry of the judgment before the maturity of the note was in accordance with the settled practice, not only in Pennsylvania, but also in other jurisdictions where judgments by confession have been authorized.

There are also some authorities in this State, holding, substantially, that judgments, similar to the one in question, when rendered under the authority of the law of the State in which they are entered, may be enforced by action in this State. That doctrine was impliedly held in Trebilcock v. McAlpine, 46 Hun, 471, by the General Term in the Third Department, where a judgment entered upon a Pennsylvania note, similar to that under consideration, was held to be a valid judgment in personam in this State under the laws of Congress, provided it was authorized by the law of the State where it was rendered. The judgment in that case was reversed, because it was not shown that the law in Pennsylvania authorized the entry of such a judgment.

In Huntley v. Baker, 38 Hun, 578, it was held by the General Term of the Fifth Department that, by reason of the relations between the State and its citizens, which affords protection to him and his property and imposes duties on him as such, he may be charged by judgment in personam binding on him everywhere as the result of legal proceedings instituted and carried on in conformity to the statute of the State furnishing a method of service which is not personal, and which, in fact, may not become actual notice to him, even though he is absent from the State where the judgment was entered. In that case the law authorized the service of a summons at the usual place of abode of the defendant, in case of his absence from the State, and the service was made by leaving it there in the presence of his wife.

In Gibbs v. Queen Ins. Co., 68 N. Y. 114, it was held that, where a foreign fire insurance company has designated an agent, in compliance with the State Insurance Laws, making the appointment of an attorney or agent in this State upon whom process in suits against the company may be served a prerequisite to its doing business in the State, it thereby submits itself to the jurisdiction of the state courts having authority to act; and by service of a summons on an agent so designated, the court acquires jurisdiction, and may render a judgment valid and capable of being enforced upon any property within the jurisdiction. The court in that case refers to the case of Douglas v. Forrest, 4 Bing. 686, where the decrees sued upon were pronounced in Scotland against a native thereof, who went out of the jurisdiction before the commencement of the action, and never returned, and had no notice of the proceeding. The decrees ordered him to pay certain sums of money. He had been summoned by posting, according to the law of Scotland. The court of common pleas of England held these decrees to be consistent with the principles of justice. The ruling, however, was confined to a case "where the party owed allegiance to the sovereignty which gave the judgment, from being born under it, and from his property being protected by it." The court also cited Bequet v. McCarthy, 2 Barn. & Ad. 951, where it was held that a "judgment in personam obtained in a British colony against an absent party without notice to him, but by the service, according to local law, upon the king's attorney-general for the colony, was not so contrary to natural justice as to be "void;" and in Hobhouse v. Courtney, 35 Eng. Ch. 119, it was held that where a nonresident has created an attorney in fact, to deal with the particular matter afterwards in suit, a service on such attorney will be good service upon the principal. We may also refer to the case of Vallee v. Dumergue, 4 Exch. 290, where the defendant, a resident of England, was a shareholder in a French corporation and was by the law of France required to elect a domicile in France where the directors of the company might notify him of all proceedings of the company or its shareholders. By the law of France, all legal proceedings affecting any party having his real domicile out of that kingdom, left for him at such elected domicile, were as valid as if left at his real domicile in France. A judgment recovered by default upon process served at such elected domicile was held to be a valid judgment in personam, Baron Alderson, saying: "It is not contrary to natural justice that a man who has agreed to receive a particular mode of notification of legal proceedings should be bound by a judgment in which that particular mode of notification has been followed, even though he may not have had actual notice of them."

To come, however, more particularly to judgments by confession, I am of the opinion that the one under consideration conforms to all of the requirements of the law in the various countries where such judgments have been authorized. It is stated in Chitty's General Practice (vol. 2, p. 838, 1st ed.), in speaking of the jurisdiction of the court of king's bench, that "this court (as well as common pleas and exchequer) has an exclusive summary jurisdiction (as well of an equitable as of a legal nature) over a warrant of attorney authorizing a judgment in the particular court, and all proceedings thereon to entertain a motion to set the same aside if it authorize a judgment in that particular court; and it has been usual to frame that security under seal, enabling certain attorneys, therein named, or any other attorney of a particular court, to appear in that court as attorney for the party, and to receive a declaration in an action, usually of debt, for a named sum at the suit of the creditor, and to confess such action, or suffer judgment by nil dicit or otherwise, to be entered up against the party, and also authorizing such attorneys, respectively, to release any errors in the proceeding.

How or when this peculiar security for a debt, authorizing a creditor, as it were, per saltum, to sign a judgment and issue an execution without even issuing a writ, was first invented, does not appear; but it has now become one of the most usual collateral securities on loans of money." It is further said, with reference to the form of the warrant of attorney, that "it need not in strictness be under seal, though usually so, in order to authorize the release of errors."

But it will, perhaps, be more satisfactory to show that a practice similar to that prevailing in Pennsylvania obtained in our own State from the earliest times to the adoption of the Code in 1848. The earliest allusion to this practice occurs in chapter 15 of the Colonial Laws of 1774, under the title "An Act for the Better Discovery of Judgments in the Courts of Record in this Colony," wherein it is provided that the clerks of courts of record within six days after every term of court, shall enter in an alphabetical docket the name of the party against whom the judgment is entered, with a particular "of all judgments by confession, non sum informatus or nil dicit, etc. By chapter 104 of the Laws of 1801, it was provided "that no judgment shall be entered upon any bond or contract in writing, hereafter to be made, upon the confession of any attorney, by virtue of any authority whatever contained in the same instrument . . . with such bond or contract, and no judgment shall be entered upon any confession taken out of court before any judge," etc. By section 8, chap. 259, Laws 1818, it was provided that a confession of judgment by bond and warrant of attorney should contain a particular statement and specification of the nature and consideration of the debt or demand, and in default thereof the judgment should be adjudged fraudulent as to other bona fide creditors. Certain other provisions, in relation to warrants of attorney, not material to be particularly noticed, are found in chapter 48 of the Laws of 1818, and chapter 50 of the same year, and other years previous to 1828. By section 10, art. 1, title 4, chap. 6, Rev. Stat., it was provided "that judgments may be entered in the supreme court, or in any court of common pleas, in vacation or in term, upon a plea of confession signed by an attorney of such court, although there be no writ then pending between the parties, if the following provisions be complied with, and not otherwise: first, the authority of confessing such judgment shall be in some proper instrument, distinct from that containing the bond, contract, or other evidence of the demand for which such judgment is confessed; second, such authority shall be produced to the officer signing such judgment, and shall be filed with the clerk of the court in which the judgment shall be entered, at the time of filing and entering such judgment." It was also provided by section 4, title 3, of the same chapter, that in cases of an action upon a written instrument for the payment of money, where the defendant had suffered default, or upon confession, that a reference might be had to the clerk to assess damages, and in assessing such damages the production to the clerk of the instrument set forth in the declaration shall be sufficient evidence of the same, without any other proof.

The practice under the statutes is described by Graham, in his work on Practice, as follows: "A warrant of attorney is a written authority to the attorney to whom it is directed, or, as is more generally the case, to any attorney of the supreme court, or any other court of record, to appear for the party executing it, and receive a declaration for him in an action at the suit of a person therein mentioned, and thereupon to confess the same, or to suffer judgment to pass by default; it also, in general, contains a release of errors. It must be subscribed by the defendant, and must be in some proper instrument (usually by deed in the presence of a subscribing witness, although this is not necessary) distinct from that containing the bond, contract, or other evidence of the demand for which the judgment is confessed; and it must be produced to the officer signing the judgment, and filed with the clerk of the court in which the judgment is entered, at the time of the filing and docketing of such judgment. . . . Within a year and a day from the date of the warrant of attorney, judgment may be entered up as of course, without the leave of court." Graham, Pr. chap. 4, p. 467 et seq. I have been unable to find any rule 13 L. R. A.

or precedent in this country or England requiring a power of attorney to confess judgment to be acknowledged, or even to be attested by a subscribing witness. The Code of Procedure effected a change in the mode of procedure, and reinstated the practice of combining in one instrument the authority for a judgment and the proof of debt, and described the process as judgment by confession. By that Code a party could confess judgment either for money due, or to become due, or to secure a person for contingent liability on behalf of the defendant. To do this the defendant was required only to make a statement in writing, signed and verified by him, naming the amount for which judgment might be entered, and authorizing its entry, and stating, concisely, the facts out of which the liability arose. Upon filing this statement with the clerk of the court, he was required to enter the judgment for the amount confessed, with $5 costs and disbursements, and the statement and affidavit, with judgment indorsed thereon, became the judgment roll. It is thus apparent that, under the practice now existing in this State, judgments are daily entered in our courts without process, declaration, or appearance, and without the intervention of the court, or even an attorney, and without proof of any authority from the defendant except that inferred from his signature to the statement.

This brief historical statement of the condition of the law on the subject in this State will have failed in its purpose if it does not show that heretofore the filing in court of a warrant of attorney, authorizing the confession of a particular judgment, gave the court jurisdiction, over the person of the party executing it, to adjudicate according to its regular practice upon the subject embraced in the warrant. When the warrant is for the confession of judgment for a specific sum, it is, of course, unnecessary to prove the nature, existence, or amount of the debt upon the assessment of damages, as the express authority of the warrant supplies the place of such proof. And, as it is held in Pennsylvania on a warrant authorizing any attorney to confess judgment, the prothonotary may properly be considered such attorney. There would seem to be no valid reason why this should not be so, as the warrant authorizes the plaintiff to select any attorney he may desire, and the exercise of that authority is, at the most, a mere matter of form. Judgment is entered there, as here, on the request of the plaintiff, by the clerk, without the intervention of the judge in term time or vacation, and, in case the debt is not then due, execution is stayed until it matures. The only material difference existing between the present practice in this State and in Pennsylvania, in relation to judgments by confession, is that here a defendant is required to verify his statement as to the nature and circumstances of the indebtedness. This requirement has no relation, however, to the jurisdiction of the court or the authority of the clerk to enter judgment, as its only purpose has frequently been declared to protect creditors from judgments fraudulently confessed by an insolvent debtor. Sheldon v. Stryker, 84 Barb. 121; Chappel v. Chappel, 12 N. Y. 219; Dunham v. Waterman, 17 N. Y. 9. In the latter case, Judge Selden says: "The object of the Statute being to protect the creditors of the party confessing the judgment against fraud, its violation forms a proper subject of equitable jurisdiction." In the case of Sheldon v. Stryker, supra, Judge Emott says, in view of the principles declared in the cases of Chappel and Dunham, above cited, that such judgment is not "an absolute nullity if it is valid as to any person. It is valid as to the defendant in the judgment, for he cannot even move to set it aside, and such judgments are always amended as to him." It was therefore held that a judgment entered by confession, although it be not confessed in conformity with the provisions of the Code, is not absolutely void, but is voidable, at the instance of certain creditors, only. In view of these decisions, it would be idle to contend that a defendant can impeach a judgment entered upon a warrant of attorney signed by him, and in conformity thereto, whether his statement be verified or acknowledged or not. It is not easy to point out any difference in principle between the practice now prevailing in this State and that pursued in Pennsylvania. Given a valid warrant of attorney in either State, the rest is matter of form, to be regulated by the laws of the respective States where the cause of action arises.

The judgment should therefore be affirmed.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT

v.

Edgar M. GEER, Appt.

(.....Conn.....)

1. Woodcock, ruffed grouse, or quail need not have been killed for the purpose of conveying them out of the State in order to make it an offense under Gen. Stat., § 2546, to have such birds in possession with intent to procure their transportation out of the State.

2. A state statute prohibiting game birds to be killed for the purpose of conveying them out of the State is not an unlawful interference with interstate commerce.

(October 26, 1891.)

NOTE.—Game Laws as affecting interstate commerce.

The apparently conflicting decisions of the different States on this subject may be mostly reconciled by considering the difference in the language of the statutes.

A statute making it an offense, under a penalty, to have game that has been killed in possession within a certain period of the year, without reference to the time or place of killing, is not, as to game killed in another State, in violation of the Constitution of the United States as an interference with interstate commerce. Phelps v. Racey, 60 N. Y. 10; State v. Randolph, 1 Mo. App. 15; Magner v. People, 97 Ill. 320; New York Game Prot. Assn. v. Durham, 19 Jones & S. 806.

And it makes no difference that the game was lawfully killed and purchased before the close season began, if sold afterwards. Magner v. People, and New York Game Prot. Assn. v. Durham, supra.

So in England it has been held that birds killed in Holland and received by a poulterer in England are within the Act of 39 and 40 Vict., chap. 23, § 2, which prohibits any person during a certain portion of the year from having such birds in his possession that have been recently killed. Whitehead v. Smithers, L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 553.

A statute making it unlawful to transport game killed within the limits of the State knowing it to have been sold, or to carry it to any place where it is to be sold, or to any place outside of the State, was held valid in a case where the transportation complained of was between places in the same State without any intimation from the court that it would not also be valid as to transportation to places without the State. The court declared that 13 L. R. A.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for New London County, convicting him of a violation of the Game Laws. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. R. Wheeler and H. A. Hull for appellant.

Mr. Solomon Lucas, for the State:

This is not one of that class of cases where the law of the State attempts to prohibit the transportation of articles beyond its limits in which the right of property thereto is absolute in the shipper. The assertion of the appellant that the birds had become an article of commerce is based upon a misapprehension and assumes the point in controversy.

American Exp. Co. v. People, 9 L. R. A.

the Legislature could permit persons to kill game on such terms and conditions as it might dictate, and that the person killing it had only such property interest in the game as the Legislature may confer. American Exp. Co. v. People, 9 L. R. A. 133, 133 Ill. 649.

But an important modification of the above decisions, if, indeed, it can be reconciled with the last one, is made by the decision that the interstate transportation of carcasses of animals which had been killed in violation of the Game Laws of a State after it has begun cannot be interrupted by a seizure thereof for violation of such laws. Bennett v. American Exp. Co. (Me.) ante, 33.

In several States the Statutes are construed to be intended merely to protect the game of their own State respectively, and not to prohibit the possession of game killed in other States. Thus the possession or offer for sale of "any of said birds" prohibited by Mass. Stat. 1879, chap. 209, § 1, which is prohibited by a clause following the prohibition of taking or killing woodcock, etc., in the Commonwealth, applies only to birds taken or killed within the State. Com. v. Hall, 128 Mass. 410.

The possession of game killed in another State is not an offense under the Michigan Act of 1881, which makes it an offense to have game in possession for the purpose of sale during a certain period of the year, since the purpose of the Act as shown by the title is the protection of game within the State. People v. O'Neill, 71 Mich. 325.

So the Pennsylvania Act of June 3, 1873, enacting that "no person shall kill or expose for sale or have in his or her possession," etc., after the same has been killed within certain dates, is construed not to apply to the possession of game killed in another State. Com. v. Wilkinson, 120 Pa. 236. B. A. R.

188, 133 Ill. 649; Magner v. People, 97 Ill. 320.

Seymour, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The General Statutes (§ 2530) provide that "every person who shall buy, sell, expose for sale, or have in his possession for any purpose, or who shall hunt, pursue, kill, destroy, or attempt to kill, any woodcock, quail, ruffed grouse, called 'partridge,' or gray squirrel, between the first day of January and the first day of October, the killing or having possession of each bird or squirrel to be deemed a separate offense, . . . shall be fined not more than twenty-five dollars," etc. Section 2546 provides that "no person shall at any time kill any woodcock, ruffed grouse, or quail for the purpose of conveying the same beyond the limits of the State; or shall transport, or have in possession with intent to procure the transportation, beyond said limits, any of such birds killed within this State. The reception by any person within this State of any such bird or birds for shipment to a point without the State shall be prima facie evidence that said bird or birds were killed within the State for the purpose of conveying the same beyond its limits." The defendant is prosecuted for unlawfully receiving and having in his possession, on the 19th day of October, A. D. 1889, with force and arms, and with the unlawful intent to procure the transportation beyond the limits of this State, certain woodcock, ruffed grouse, and quail, killed within this State after the 1st day of October, A. D. 1889, against the peace, and contrary to the form of the Statute. He demurred to the complaint because (1) the allegations contained therein do not constitute any offense in law; (2) because in the complaint it is not alleged that said birds were killed for the purpose of conveying the same beyond the limits of the State.

It will be seen from the section of the Statute above quoted that it is unlawful to kill or have in possession for any purpose, woodcock, quail, or ruffed grouse, between the first days of January and October, and that it is unlawful to kill them at any time for the purpose of conveying them out of the State. Is it also unlawful to have them in possession with intent to procure their transportation beyond the limits of the State, if killed between the 1st day of October and the 1st day of January, regardless of the question whether they were killed for the purpose of conveying them out of the State? In other words, if they were lawfully killed,—i. e., between October 1 and January 1, and without any intention of conveying them out of the State,—can they be lawfully held with the intent to procure their transportation beyond the limits of the State? In 1882 an Act was passed as follows: "Section 1. No person shall at any time kill any woodcock, ruffed grouse, or quail for the purpose of conveying the same beyond the limits of this State. Sec. 2. No person, corporation, or company shall transport or convey beyond the limits of this State any woodcock, ruffed grouse, or quail, killed within this State, or sell or have in his or their possession any of such birds with the intention to procure the same to be conveyed or transported beyond the limits of this State. Sec. 3. The reception by any person, company, or corporation within the limits of this State of any quail, woodcock, or ruffed grouse for shipment to a point without the State shall be prima facie evidence that the said bird or birds were killed within the State for the purpose of carrying the same beyond the limits of this State. Sec. 4. Any person violating any of the provisions of the preceding sections shall be fined not less than seven nor more than fifty dollars and costs of prosecution." Pub. Acts 1882, chap. 102.

It is evident that under the Act as originally passed the complaint would have been good and sufficient. It is claimed by the defendant that under the Act as revised no offense is committed unless the birds, by him held for transportation, were killed for the purpose of being conveyed beyond the limits of the State. He says that the word "such" in the provision of section 2546 against transporting, or having in possession with intent to procure the transportation, beyond said limits, any of such birds, killed within the State, means woodcock, ruffed grouse, or quail, killed for the purpose of conveying the same beyond the limits of the State. As already suggested, that construction involves a change in the law from the original Act, which expressly forbade any person to have in his possession, with the intention to procure the same to be transported beyond the limits of the State, any woodcock, ruffed grouse, or quail killed within the State. It seems to us evident, also, upon the face of the Statute as revised, that the word "such" was used only to obviate the necessity of repeating the words "woodcock, ruffed grouse, or quail," and that to carry its force and operation further, so as to include the purpose for which they were killed, would not only be unnatural, but dangerous as a precedent for construction, in view of the terms of the old Statute. We cannot believe that careful revisers would have undertaken to change the law without some more definite indication of such purpose. Then, again, when the words "such birds" are used in the very next line of the section, it is evident that they are used to take the place only of the words "woodcock, ruffed grouse, or quail," as if it read: "The reception by any person within the State of any woodcock, ruffed grouse, or quail, for shipment to a point without this State, shall be prima facie evidence that said bird or birds were killed within this State for the purpose of conveying the same beyond its limits;" otherwise we should have the absurd provision that the reception by any person within the State, for shipment to any point without the State, of any woodcock, ruffed grouse, or quail killed for the purpose of conveying the same beyond the limits of the State, shall be prima facie evidence that said birds were killed within the State for the purpose of conveying the same beyond its limits,—that is, the fact that they were killed for transportation shall be prima facie evidence that they were killed for transportation. The word "such" in both sentences refers to the same antecedent. It is plain enough that the revisers intended not to change, but to condense, the sections of the original Statute, and the language should be construed in the light of such intention. We conclude, therefore, that the complaint is sufficient.

We see nothing in the decision of Com v. Hall, 128 Mass. 411, to which the defendant refers us, inconsistent with our conclusion. The object of the Act therein involved was to protect the game in that Commonwealth, and not in another; and a construction confining its force to birds killed therein was to be expected, in the absence of controlling words to the contrary. All the reasoning in that case may certainly be held sound without impugning the reasoning upon which we arrive at our conclusion in this.

But in this view of the matter another question arises. The defendant further demurred to the complaint "(3) because section 2546 of the General Statutes is unconstitutional and void so far as it may be construed to forbid the transporting from the State, or having possession of such birds with intent to procure such transportation, to another State, birds described therein, which birds have been sold to parties in such other State, and have begun to move as an article of interstate commerce; and (4) because it is made to appear in said complaint that the defendant is guilty under said section if such birds were bought by the defendant in the markets of this State as merchandise and commerce, and had begun to move as an article of commerce." In short, the defendant insists that the Statute, as construed by us, is unconstitutional as restricting interstate commerce, and refers to Robbins v. Shelby County Taxing Dist. 120 U. S. 489, 30 L. ed. 694; The Daniel Ball v. United States, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 566, 19 L. ed. 1002; Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. v. Husen, 95 U. S. 465, 24 L. ed. 527; State v. Saunders, 19 Kan. 127; Territory v. Evans, (Idaho) 7 L. R. A. 288; Territory v. Nelson (Idaho) 23 Pac. Rep. 116; State v. Indiana & O. O. G. & Min. Co. 120 Ind. 575, 6 L. R. A. 579, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 758; American Exp. Co. v. People, 133 Ill. 649, 9 L. R. A. 188.

In State v. Saunders, 19 Kan. 127, the court says it seems to be finally settled, among other things, that no State can pass a law which will directly interfere with the free transportation from one State to another, or through a State, of anything which is or may be subject to interstate commerce; that a law which prohibits the catching and killing of prairie chickens may be valid, although it may indirectly prevent the transportation of such chickens from the State to any other State; but a law which allows prairie chickens to be caught and killed, and thereby to become the subject of traffic and commerce, and at the same time directly prohibits their transportation from the State, is unconstitutional and void. Without stopping to consider the construction which was given to the constitutional provision under discussion by the earlier commentators, except to suggest, in the language of Judge Story

(2 Story Com. 511), that a very material object of its adoption was the relief of the States, which export and import through other States, from the levy of improper contributions on them by the latter,—an object which was shown to be important by the experience of the States during the confederation period,—we feel constrained to hold the provision of the Statute to be constitutional. It being conceded that the State, under its general police power, may lawfully prohibit the killing of the game birds in question, it may of course control such killing, and the times and purposes thereof. It may lawfully enact that they may be killed and sold and held for sale only for domestic consumption. The State, in the exercise of its power, instead of prohibiting the killing altogether, permits the person killing them to acquire only a qualified right in them, namely, the right to appropriate them to his own use, and the right to sell or transport them for domestic use. The birds in question never became articles of commerce within the meaning of the term contended for by the defendant. They became private property of a qualified character. The law limited the purposes for which they might be killed and become private property. The difference between property of this sort and the ordinary private property of commerce is obvious. The apparent assumption of the Kansas court above referred to, that game which the law allows to be caught and killed thereby necessarily becomes the subject of traffic and commerce, meaning interstate commerce, appears to us unsound. If the proposition were true, then the conclusion that a state law interfering with such commerce would be unconstitutional might pass unquestioned. But we cannot acquiesce in a decision which would deny the power of the State to limit the right to kill, sell, and hold its own game by any provision short of an absolute prohibition, without thereby transforming it into that species of property the transportation of which from the State it is unconstitutional to prohibit.

Charles G. ALLERTON, Appt.

(.....Conn.....)

1. A blank indorsement by a stranger to a note, under Gen. Stat., § 1360, which makes it "import the contract of an ordinary indorsement," renders the indorser liable as such precisely in the order in which he stands upon the note, although he signs before and above the payee.

2. Parol evidence is not admissible to vary the effect of a blank indorsement by a stranger to the instrument where the statute provides that it shall have the effect of an ordinary indorsement.

(April 30, 1891.)

NOTE.—See note on "parol evidence," as to indorsement, with case of Kingland v. Koepp (Ill.) ante, 649.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for New Haven County in favor of plaintiffs in an action brought to enforce defendant's alleged liability as indorser of a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. W. Kellogg, for appellant:

The record discloses no facts or evidence whatever that can render the defendant liable to the payee of the notes as a guarantor.

If it was intended by the parties to the note other than the defendant, that his indorsement was a guaranty for the security of the plaintiffs only, that intention should have been disclosed to the defendant. "Such an indorsement would be sufficient to put the payee, or person to whom it was offered, on his guard, and require of him, before he relies upon it, to make inquiry."

Riddle v. Stevens, 82 Conn. 387.

In the early decisions in this State, as to the effect of a blank indorsement by a third party, there appears to have been an intention or agreement by such third party that the indorsement was made as surety for the maker, for the security of the note to the payee. When such an intention or agreement appeared, the indorsement in blank of the third party was held to be a guaranty to the payee of the note; and the legal import of such an indorsement was held to be that the note when due should be collectible by the use of due diligence.

Beckwith v. Angell, 6 Conn. 815; Perkins v. Catlin, 11 Conn. 215; Lafin v. Pomeroy, 11 Conn. 440; Castle v. Candee, 16 Conn. 223.

Parol evidence has always been held to be admissible to show the real character of the indorsement, whether it was intended to be a guaranty, an ordinary indorsement of negotiable paper, or indorsed merely for the purpose of collection.

Perkins v. Catlin and Riddle v. Stevens, supra.

Gen. Stat. 1888, § 1860, was passed for the express purpose of changing the law of Connecticut, and making it conform to the settled law of other States. It says that such an indorsement "shall import the contract of an ordinary indorsement of negotiable paper, as between such indorser and the payee or subsequent holders of such paper." Such being now the legal import of such an indorsement, the plaintiff cannot recover in this case when the defendant had no knowledge that his indorsement was, or was intended to be, a guaranty. In every case of guaranty in this court since the enactment of that Statute, an express contract of guaranty was made and approved, to hold a party as a guarantor of a note.

City Sav. Bank v. Hopson, 2 New Eng. Rep. 556, 58 Conn. 458; Cowles v. Peck, 4 New Eng. Rep. 839, 55 Conn. 251; Lemmon v. Strong, 5 New Eng. Rep. 618, 55 Conn. 443; Loomis Inst. v. Hard, 57 Conn. 485; Tyler v. Waddingham, 8 L. R. A. 657, 58 Conn. 376.

Mr. Lynde Harrison, for appellee:

The contract which is implied from a blank indorsement of a promissory note, whether negotiable or non-negotiable, is that the note is due and payable according to its tenor, and that the maker shall be able to pay it when it comes to maturity, and that it is collectible by the use of due diligence.

Perkins v. Catlin, 11 Conn. 213; Clark v. Merriam, 25 Conn. 576; Ransom v. Sherwood, 26 Conn. 437; Holbrook v. Camp, 38 Conn. 25; Forbes v. Rowe, 43 Conn. 415; Allen v. Rundle, 50 Conn. 9; Lemmon v. Strong, 5 New Eng. Rep. 618, 55 Conn. 443.

If section 1860 of the General Statutes affects this case, it simply means that the blank indorser of a negotiable note, being a person who is neither its maker nor its payee, before or after the indorsement of the note by the payee, shall be under the same liability as an ordinary indorser of negotiable paper.

The contract which an ordinary indorser of negotiable paper enters into between himself and the payee, or subsequent indorsers, is an undertaking on his part to pay the note or bill on due notice of dishonor, together with certain warranties as to title, genuineness, and validity of the paper, as well as capacity and solvency of the parties.

Randolph, Com. Paper, §§ 13, 700, 705-707.

Seymour, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On September 24, 1884, the plaintiffs, at the request of one J. C. Stevens, gave him their accommodation note for $2,000, payable in three months, and agreed to give him another three-months note of the same amount at its maturity. In exchange for this note Stevens gave the plaintiffs his six-months note, of the same date, for $2,000, indorsed by the defendant. On the 27th of December, 1884, the plaintiffs gave Stevens their second note as agreed, with which he took up the first. When the second note became due the plaintiffs paid it. On the 2d of April, 1885, Stevens, in renewal of his six-months note, gave the plaintiffs his note for $1,000, payable in two months, and his note, for a like sum, payable in three months, each payable to their order at the Yale National Bank. The defendant indorsed each of these notes in blank before Stevens delivered them to the plaintiffs. Afterwards the plaintiffs indorsed them, writing their names below that of the defendant. These notes were given by Stevens to the plaintiffs as a security for the loan by the plaintiffs of the sum therein mentioned, namely, of the sum to be raised by the discount of the above-mentioned accommodation notes made by the plaintiffs. At each of the times when Stevens signed the notes, namely, on September 24, when he signed the six-months note, for $2,000, and on April 2, when he signed the two notes in renewal thereof (the indorsement of which is the subject of this suit), he and one of the plaintiffs were together at Stevens' office. Before the notes were delivered to the plaintiffs Stevens called the defendant into the office, and he then indorsed the notes in the presence of Stevens and the plaintiffs. There was no conversation in relation to the indorsements, nor was there any conversation between the defendant and the plaintiffs at any other time in relation thereto. There was no evidence of any agreement between them, except such as the law imports from the blank indorsement which the defendant put upon the notes, as the same appears upon them, under the circumstances and upon the facts already detailed. Nor was there any other evidence that the defendant had any knowledge that his indorsement of the notes was, or was intended to be, a guaranty to the plaintiffs. There was no evidence that the defendant had any knowledge of the exchange of notes by the plaintiffs and Stevens. The notes of April 2, 1885, were duly presented for payment at the bank, but were not paid. Notice thereof was duly given to the defendant. The plaintiffs still own the notes, and they are still wholly unpaid. At their maturity the maker was insolvent, and without any property exempt from execution. These are the facts in brief as they are stated in the finding. The case, after a short explanation by the counsel for the defendant, was submitted to us on briefs, and the questions discussed relate to the liability of the defendant upon the facts found. The finding is slightly complicated. To simplify the matter we copy one of the notes, with its indorsements, the other being precisely similar, except that it is payable three months after date:

"$1,000. New Haven, Ct., April 2d, 1885. Two months after date, I promise to pay to the order of I. S. Spencer's Sons one thousand dollars at Yale National Bank, value received, with interest. J. C. Stevens.

[Indorsed:] Chas. G. Allerton. I. S. Spencer's Sons."

In the year 1884 the Legislature passed the following Act: "The blank indorsement of a negotiable or a non-negotiable note, by a person who is neither its maker nor its payee, before or after the indorsement of such note by the payee, shall import the contract of an ordinary indorsement of negotiable paper as between such indorser and the payee or subsequent holders of such paper." Gen. Stat. § 1860. Before the passage of this Act, by the law of this State as declared through a long line of decisions, from Bradly v. Phelps, 2 Root, 825, to Ætna Nat. Bank v. Charter Oak L. Ins. Co., 50 Conn. 167, the blank indorsement of either a negotiable or a non-negotiable note by a stranger to the note implied, prima facie, a contract on the part of the indorser that the note was due and payable according to its tenor; that the maker should be of ability to pay it when it came to maturity; and that it was collectible by the use of due diligence. And this was the law, it was held in the latter case above cited, whether the indorsement by the third party was for the better security of the payee or for the purpose of getting the note discounted. The same case, commenting upon our long-established law on this subject, speaks of it as peculiar to this State, no part of the law-merchant, and the anomalous existence of which eminent judges, while admitting, have regretted. The Statute was doubtless intended to deliver our law from its anomalous position, and bring it into harmony with the law-merchant as it is interpreted in the great commercial centers of our country with which we are connected in business transactions, involving the daily exchange of notes, bills, and all manner of negotiable securities. The Statute is before this court for the first time, and we have given it the consideration commensurate to its importance. Under it, it is at once apparent that the blank indorsement of a negotiable or non-negotiable note by a person who is neither its maker nor payee, whether before or after its indorsement by the payee, no longer imports a contract that the indorser will pay the note if, on the use of due diligence, it is not collected of the maker. It is no longer a contract of guaranty. But it imports, as between such indorser and the payee, or subsequent holders thereof, a contract of an ordinary indorsement of negotiable paper, which is, by the law-merchant a contract for payment conditioned on due presentment to the maker for payment and due notice of dishonor. The full contract which the general commercial law implies from the indorsement of a negotiable promissory note on the part of the indorser, with and in favor of the indorsee, and every subsequent holder to whom the note is transferred, is (1) that the instrument itself, and the antecedent signatures thereon, are genuine; (2) that he (the indorser) has a good title to the instrument; (3) that he is competent to bind himself by the indorsement as indorser; (4) that the maker is competent to bind himself to the payment, and will, upon due presentment of the note, pay it at maturity, or when it is due; (5) that if, when duly presented, it is not paid by the maker, he (the indorser) will, upon due and reasonable notice given him of the dishonor, pay the same to the indorsee or other holder. Story, Prom. Notes, § 135. Into this contract, under our Statute, the indorser of a note, either negotiable or non-negotiable, though a stranger thereto, impliedly comes, as between himself and the payee or subsequent holder.

Thus far there is no difficulty, and it is evident that, prima facie at least, the defendant is an ordinary indorser, and not a guarantor of the notes. But the facts in this case require us to consider the provision of the Statute that the indorsement therein mentioned shall import a contract of ordinary indorsement between the parties named, whether it stand before or after the indorsement by the payee. Here the plaintiffs indorsed the note after the defendant, and the order of their names upon it accords with the fact. Such an indorsement falls within what Bigelow, J., in Clapp v. Rice, 13 Gray, 403, calls "an anomalous class of cases," and which the text-books generally call "irregular indorsements." It is impossible to harmonize the existing decisions in respect to the import of such an indorsement. They are very numerous, diverse, and conflicting. Our statute may render much of the discussion of other jurisdictions valueless to us except as a guide to its construction, if, upon examination, its language should appear ambiguous. Does the Statute, then, intend to go any further than simply to declare that, irrespective of the position of his name, a third person who puts his name on the back of a note is to be held as an ordinary indorser, and not as a guarantor? Or do the other provisions clearly indicate a purpose to leave no question open which would turn upon the relative position of the indorsements, and to provide that such third party, though indorsing before and above the payee, is, nevertheless, quoad him and subsequent holders, impliedly an indorser precisely in the order in which he stands upon the note? We unhesitatingly incline to the latter construction.

The language of the Statute, standing by itself, and also as construed in the light of the greater weight of authority, seems to leave no room for doubt. Daniel, in his work on Negotiable Instruments, treating of the various decisions relating to the transfer of notes by indorsement, says (sec. 713): "When nothing appears but the instrument itself, bearing a third person's name before the payee's, in a suit by the indorsee of the payee, the question next arises, What is to be presumed to have been the contract and liability of such a person? It will be presumed, in the first place, from the fact that the name is before that of the payee in order, that it was placed there before his in point of time, and was placed upon the note in its inception with a view of strengthening its credit with the payee, and inducing him to take it; and, for the reason that such third person never was the legal holder of the paper, it is held by a number of authorities that he cannot be deemed an indorser, and must be regarded, prima facie, as a joint maker. By others it is held that he is prima facie a surety or guarantor, using those terms as the equivalent of joint maker; others consider that he is prima facie only secondarily liable as a guarantor; while very many regard him as assuming the liability of a second indorser." "But," says the author (§ 714), "it would seem to us that such a party ought to be regarded as first indorser. If he intended to be second indorser, he should have refrained from putting his name on the note until it was first indorsed by the payee. By placing it first he enables the payee to place his own afterwards; and prima facie the facts would seem to indicate such intention. There is nothing in the objection that there is no title in him to indorse away. Prior parties could not be sued without the payee's indorsement; but he, being an indorser, can be sued by anyone deriving title under him. In fact, his position seems to render his liability strictly analogous to that of the drawer of a bill upon the maker in favor of the payee; and so to regard it simplifies, as it seems to us, a question which, unless such analogy be followed, is exceedingly complicated and difficult." "When (§ 716) the note is sued upon by the payee, it is held that the idea of the party before him being bound as an indorser is excluded. But this doctrine does not seem to us correct. The indorsement, it is true, is an irregular one; but it is quite similar to a bill drawn by the indorser on the maker, and to follow that analogy in all regards seems to us the simplest and most reasonable solution of the question. And there are a number of cases which regard such a party's liability as prima facie that of an indorser." Judge Story, discussing the various decisions concerning irregular indorsements, says: 18 L. R. A.

"When the note is negotiable, and is indorsed in blank by a third person, not being the payee or a prior indorsee thereof, there, in the absence of any controlling proof, it is presumed that such person means to bind himself in the character of an indorser, and not otherwise, and precisely in the order and manner in which he stands on the note. If the note is not negotiable, and the indorsement in blank is not a part of the original transaction, but subsequently made, then, in the absence of the like controlling proofs, it is deemed a mere guaranty, and the indorser liable only as guarantor." Story, Prom. Notes, § 480.

Randolph, in his recent treatise on Commercial Paper, goes extensively into the subject of irregular indorsements. Presuming that it is a matter of frequent occurrence, in the United States especially, that one who is neither maker nor payee of a note places his name on the back of it at the time of its inception, he says the legal effect of such indorsements has been much discussed and variously decided. He discusses the numerous cases which follow the Massachusetts rule, and hold such indorser to be a joint maker, though now, by Statute of 1882, he is entitled, like an indorser, to notice of dishonor; the also numerous cases which hold, as did our courts, such an indorser to be a guarantor; and the cases, in opposition to both of these views, which hold that such indorser contracts and becomes liable as an indorser, his position on the back of the note indicating that intention. In California and Dakota, he adds (§ 836), "he is now by statute liable as an indorser to the payee; and so, by a recent Statute in Connecticut, whether the note is negotiable or not, and whether he indorses before or after the payee." Randolph, Com. Paper, § 829, et seq.

In Hall v. Newcomb, 7 Hill, 416, it was held that one who writes his name in blank on the back of a negotiable note before the payee indorses the same is not liable as maker nor as guarantor; thus, says Woodruff, J., in Hahn v. Hull, 4 E. D. Smith, 670, overruling all the previous cases to that effect. It was also held in Hall v. Newcomb, that the person so writing his name could be held liable to such payee as indorser. Spies v. Gilmore, 1 N. Y. 322, is to the same effect. In Moore v. Cross, 19 N. Y. 227, it was held that one who, for the accommodation of the maker, indorses his note payable to the order of a third person, is liable thereon to such payee as indorser. In that case, as in the one at bar, the third party indorsed the paper before it was indorsed by the payee. Thus it would appear that in New York the result reached by our Statute was reached through the courts instead of through the Legislature. The authorities quoted, by showing the various positions which have been taken respecting the matter under consideration, throw light not only upon the presumed intention of the Legislature in passing the statute, and the interpretation which should be given it, but show also the impossibility of harmonizing our law, under any interpretation of it, with the law of all our neighboring States. From this examination of the authorities we feel the more assured in holding that the defendant, in the case at bar, upon the showing of the note itself, is an ordinary indorser, and may be held as such by the plaintiff, who is payee, and whose name appears as an indorser subsequent to that of the defendant. So much for the contract which the Statute imports.

A third question remains, namely, whether the contract which the Statute imports can be varied by parol evidence, and, if so, when and how. The general expressions scattered through our reports, consequent upon our peculiar law respecting the contract prima facie implied by the indorsement of a note by a stranger, make it a little difficult to give an answer that shall at first sight appear consistent with some of our decisions, or rather with some of the expressions used in some of our decisions. Indeed, the principle involved has been variously decided in different jurisdictions and at different times in the same jurisdiction. In Riddle v. Stevens, 32 Conn. 378, after stating the contract which the law implies from the blank indorsement of a note by a stranger, the case holds that this implication is, however, only prima facie, and will yield to proof of the real character of the contract. Notes so indorsed, it says, have not the sanctity of ordinary negotiable paper, and do not fall within the rules of the law-merchant. Any person taking them, therefore, is put upon an inquiry as to the real character of the contract. In Beckwith v. Angell, 6 Conn. 315, a third party wrote his name on the back of a non-negotiable note, under, as he claimed, a special parol agreement with the payee. It was decided that he might prove the special agreement when sued by the payee. The court said: "The undertaking of an indorser is always collateral, unless made otherwise by a special agreement. But the defendant was not an indorser, because he was neither promisee nor indorsee. His contract was therefore necessarily special, and whatever the parties chose to make it."

It appears from these and other cases which might be cited that parol evidence has been admitted to prove the real contract entered into by a third party when he made a blank indorsement of a note, because such blank indorsement only prima facie implied a contract of guaranty; and because, being anomalous, and not the ordinary indorsement recognized by the law-merchant, it possessed none of its sanctity, but was its own sufficient notice of its irregularity. But our courts have not failed to recognize and uphold the sanctity of a regular indorsement. The law on that subject was admirably stated by Butler, Ch. J., in Dale v. Gear, 38 Conn. 15. That case held "that the contract implied by law from a blank indorsement of a negotiable note before its maturity by the payee is as certain and absolute as if written out in full, and parol evidence is not admissible to contradict it. This rule is applicable between indorser and indorsee, and it is not competent for the former to prove a contemporaneous naked agreement that an unrestricted indorsement should be operative as a restricted one only, in bar of an action by the latter." "There are," says the opinion, "four classes of cases in which, as exceptional cases, and as between the original parties, indorser and indorsee, any relation, antecedent agreement, or state of facts, from which a controlling equity arises, may be pleaded and proved by parol in bar of an action on the warranty. Thus the relation of principal and agent may be shown, for the agent takes no title or warranty from the indorser, but holds as agent. So, secondly, it may be shown that the note was indorsed to the holder for some special purpose, and is holden in trust, as where it is indorsed and delivered for collection merely. Thirdly, the relation of principal and surety may be shown, and that the indorsement was made at the request and for the accommodation of the immediate indorsee; for the equity of the relation forbids the enforcement of the contract. Such was the case of Case v. Spaulding, 24 Conn. 578. So, fourthly, it may be shown that there was an equity arising from an antecedent transaction, including an agreement that the note should be taken in sole reliance on the responsibility of the maker, and that it was indorsed in order to transfer the title in pursuance of such agreement, and that the attempt to enforce it is a fraud. Such was Downer v. Chesbrough, 36 Conn. 39. These exceptions illustrate the rule."

In Allen v. Rundle, 45 Conn. 328, the defendants had signed a writing on the back of the note, as follows: "For value received, we jointly and severally guaranty the within note good and collectible until paid." Held, that it could not be shown by parol that the defendants, though in form guarantors, in fact undertook thereby to obligate themselves to pay the note; nor that they made at the time a verbal promise to pay the debt. The court says: "There is an anomalous class of cases where a third person, neither payee nor maker, puts his name on the back of a note before its indorsement by the payee, where by parol evidence such person may be held liable either as original promisor, guarantor, or indorser, according to the nature of the transaction and the understanding of the parties. [Citing cases.] But in all these cases the indorsement is in blank, and there is no written contract, and none is definitely implied by law from the indorsement. In cases of blank indorsements, where the contract is implied by law, it has the same effect as if written, and parol evidence is not admissible to contradict or vary it. The Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in the recent case of Allen v. Brown, 124 Mass. 77, held that parol evidence was not admissible to show that indorsers who indorsed a promissory note before delivery to the payee were accommodation indorsers and sureties only." In Story on Promissory Notes, § 146, note 1, many cases are cited to the point that the contract implied by law, from a regular indorsement, is as certain as if it were expressed in writing, and parol evidence is not admitted to vary it. To the same effect see Daniel, Neg. Inst. § 717 et seq. In Randolph on Commercial Paper, where much attention is given to the subject throughout the work, it is stated (§ 778) that most authorities hold that the implications and intendments which the law-merchant has attached to blank indorsements of negotiable commercial paper render them express and complete contracts which cannot be explained or varied by parol. See also 2 Parsons, Notes & Bills, p. 28, chap. 1, § 6.

Now, under our Statute, the blank indorsement of a negotiable or non-negotiable note, by a person who is neither its maker nor its payee before or after the indorsement of such note by the payee, can no longer be classed as an anomalous or irregular indorsement, nor will the rules applicable to such indorsements any longer apply. They cease to exist as the reason for them ceases. By the very terms and force of the Statute such an indorsement becomes, to all intents, a regular, ordinary indorsement, and the rules applicable to the regular indorsement of negotiable paper apply. Evidently, then, the judgment rendered by the court below for the plaintiffs in this case was correct. The defendant's case comes within none of the exceptions named in Dale v. Gear, supra. It comes nearest to the third exception. But in the case of Case v. Spaulding, 24 Conn. 578, given as an example of what was covered by that exception, the note was only apparently commercial paper, regularly indorsed. In fact, the defendant, a stranger to the note, indorsed it in blank at the request of the plaintiff, who afterwards indorsed it over the defendant's name, and procured it to be discounted at the bank. As between the parties it was the case of a note indorsed in blank by a stranger, the prima facie import of which was that the indorser would pay it if it could not be collected of the maker by the use of due diligence. But the law permitted the defendant to show the real contract, and he proved that his indorsement was intended as security for the bank only, and was made because the bank would not discount the note for the plaintiff on the security of the maker alone, but required an indorser. So the plaintiff, who was the payee, and the first indorser in order of names, though second in order of time, failed to recover. In the case at bar the defendant indorsed the notes in the presence of their maker and the plaintiffs before they were delivered. There was no conversation at that time in relation to such indorsement, nor ever any between the plaintiffs and defendant in relation thereto, nor any evidence of any agreement between them different from that which the law imports from the blank indorsement of the defendant under the circumstances stated. Such circumstances certainly indicate that the indorsement was made for the security of the plaintiffs. At their maturity the notes were duly presented for payment, but were not paid. Due notice of their dishonor was given to the defendant, and subsequently this suit was brought. We see no sufficient reason why, under the Statute, the defendant must not be held as an ordinary indorser of negotiable paper. As the law now stands, if a party intends to contract only as second indorser, he should see to it that the location of his name accords with such intention. If he intends to contract as guarantor, or to make any different contract from that of an ordinary indorser, he should write it out above his signature.

There is no error in the judgment appealed from.

The other Judges concurred.

(30 Neb. 877.)

1. A proposition to issue bonds to a railway company is in the nature of a contract, upon the acceptance of which both parties are bound by the agreement.

2. Where certain petitioners were induced to sign a petition calling an election in K. Township, Seward County, upon the representations of an agent of the railway company that the depot would be located on section 16 of said township, when in fact the depot was afterwards located in section 17.—Held, that the company was bound by the representations of its agents, and that persons who had been deceived thereby, and induced to sign the petition, might set up such facts to enjoin the issuing of the bonds.

*Head notes by the COURT.

NOTE.—For power to issue railroad aid bonds, see Cantillon v. Dubuque & N. W. R. Co. (Iowa) 5 L. R. A. 726, note.

3. At least fifty freeholders resident of the township, etc., must sign a petition to the county commissioners requesting them to call an election in said township for the purpose of voting aid for a railway. Without a petition so signed by the full number required the commissioners have no jurisdiction.

(On rehearing.)

4. Where, in the course of the canvassing and electioneering to induce a sufficient number of freeholders of a certain town to become signers of a petition to the county board for an election for the issuance of bonds to be donated to a railroad company, certain representations, promises, and inducements were falsely and fraudulently made and held out by the railroad company to such freeholders, and which resulted in such freeholders becoming signers to said petition.—Held, that such representations, promises, and inducements, although made at a time and meeting previous to the time at which said freeholders became signers, were nevertheless a part of the res gestae.

5. Where two agents of a railroad company were engaged in the common purpose of soliciting the freeholders of a town to become signers to a petition for the calling of an election to vote bonds, and one of said agents made certain pledges and promises, and held out certain inducements, to said freeholders, who shortly afterwards were by the other of the said agents presented with said petition, and signed the same.—Held, that such pledges, promises, and inducements were a part of the res gestæ.

(December 22, 1890.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the District Court for Seward County enjoining the issuance of certain railroad aid bonds. Affirmed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinions.

Messrs. D. C. McKillip and George W. Post, for appellants:

None of the representations were made by Goehner while soliciting signers to the petition or while he had the petition for that purpose, and no representations appear to have been made at or about the time of signing; and we insist that in such case they are not a part of the res gestæ and are inadmissible.

Mechem, Ag. §§ 714, 716, note.

All Goehner ever told any of the witnesses was merely where, in his judgment, the depot would be, and this could not have misled, and was not relied on.

A person dealing with an agent is bound to inquire as to his authority.

Wheeler v. Plattsmouth, 7 Neb. 279.

Goehner's promise to locate a depot at any particular place is insufficient to invalidate the signing of the petition as a fraudulent representation cannot be predicated on a promise not performed.

The representations must have been made positively as an ascertained and existing fact and so believed to be such existing fact, and must be clearly and distinctly proved as alleged in the petition.

Nor were the representations made as the representations of the railroad company, but were usually made as the individual representations of Goehner, and in such case they could not bind the company, by reason of its claiming the bonds.

Maxwell, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to enjoin the issuing of certain bonds of K. Township, in the County of Seward, and to have said bonds canceled, and delivered up, and declared null and void. The pleadings, which are very lengthy, need not be set out in this opinion. On the trial of the cause, the court made findings and rendered judgment as follows: "Now, on this 29th day of December, 1888, this cause, heretofore tried on a former day of the present term of court, and taken under advisement, came on for decision and judgment, and the court, being now fully advised in the premises, does find the issues joined in favor of the plaintiffs; and that the injunction heretofore allowed and granted and issued herein ought to be made perpetual; and that the bonds now under custody of the court, in the hands and keeping of S. C. Langworthy, ought to be canceled, and held for naught; and that the said colorable and the apparent record of the proceedings of the board of supervisors of Seward County, recorded in Commissioner's Record No. 4, pp. 94 to 98, inclusive, and on pages 127 to 131, so far as the same relates to the calling of an election, and the voting of bonds, in said K. Township, is incorrect, unauthorized, and ought to be canceled, set aside, and held for naught. It is therefore by the court considered, ordered, and adjudged that the said bonds, and the proposition for their issue, and the election held, and proceedings had and done in pursuance thereof, in reference to the issue of said bonds of K. Township, in Seward County, Neb., were unauthorized by law and void, and that the same, and all proceedings of the said board of supervisors in reference thereto, be held for naught; that the said defendants, their successors in office or assigns, are perpetually enjoined and restrained from delivering or authorizing the delivery, in any capacity whatever, of the said bonds, or any of them, to the said defendant railroad company, and from negotiating or transferring them, or any of them, at any time, and the said defendant railroad company, its officers, assigns, agents, and successors, are each of them restrained from receiving, claiming, assigning, or negotiating said bonds, or any of them, and from in any way holding the same to be valid; that the said board of supervisors and county clerk, and their successors in office, are severally enjoined and restrained from signing, authenticating, or in any way validating, said election canvass on the question submitted at said special election, or the record of said proposition submitted, or the record of the board of supervisors thereon, and from in any way giving color of validity of said proceedings, or any of them, and from recognizing in any way the same to be valid."

To authorize a precinct, township, or village to issue bonds, the Statute requires "a petition signed by not less than fifty freeholders of the precinct, township, or village to be presented to the county commissioners, or board authorized by law to attend to the business of the county within which such precinct, township, or village is situated. Said petition shall set forth the nature of the work contemplated, the amount of the bonds sought to be voted, the rate of interest, which shall in no event exceed eight per cent per annum, and the date when the principal and interest shall become due; and the said petitioners shall give bond, to be approved by the county commissioners, for the payment of the expenses of the election, in the event that the proposition shall fail to receive a two-thirds majority of the votes cast at the election." It appears from the record that fifty persons did sign the petition, and that thereupon the election was duly called and held, and the bonds declared carried. This election appears to have been held before the depot in the Township of K., Seward County, was located. There is a large amount of testimony in the record tending to show that a considerable number of the signers of the petition were induced to sign the same by representations of the agents of the railroad company that a freight and passenger depot on the line of said railroad would be located upon section 16 of said township. The depot finally was located upon section 17 of said township. A proposition to issue bonds to aid in the construction of a railway is in the nature of a contract, which, when accepted, is binding upon the respective parties; hence, if the electors, through false or fraudulent representations, have been induced to vote bonds to aid in the construction of such railway, a court of equity, in a proper case, will grant relief. Curry v. Decatur County Suprs. 61 Iowa, 71; Sinnett v. Moles, 88 Iowa, 25; Henderson v. San Antonio & M. G. R. Co. 17 Tex. 560, 67 Am. Dec. 675; Crump v. United States Min. Co. 7 Gratt. 353, 56 Am. Dec. 116; Wickham v. Grant, 28 Kan. 517.

Where parties have been induced, by false representations, to sign a petition calling an election to vote aid to a railway, they may set up such false representations as grounds for enjoining the issuing of the bonds. Sinnett v. Moles, Curry v. Decatur County Suprs. and Wickham v. Grant, supra; Meleny v. Keen, 89 Ill. 395; Sandford v. Handy, 23 Wend. 260; Burhop v. Milwaukee, 18 Wis. 431; McClellan v. Scott, 24 Wis. 81; Davis v. Dumont, 87 Iowa, 47; Vreeland v. New Jersey Stone Co. 29 N. J. Eq. 188.

If, therefore, the plaintiffs were induced to sign the petition by false representations, they have a right to set up such representations to prevent the issuing of the bonds. It is claimed, however, that the persons who procured the signatures to the petition were not the agents of the railway company, and therefore such company cannot be affected by their statements. This question was before the Supreme Court of New York in Sandford v. Handy. 23 Wend. 265, and the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Nelson, who says: "The distinction between 'general' and 'special' agent has often been the subject of discussion in adjudged cases, and by elementary writers, but it is not particularly important here, as this is conceded to be a case of special agency. Our inquiry is more especially directed to ascertain the extent of the principal's responsibility in cases of this character; or rather, confining it more particularly to the point before us, to what extent and to what circumstances will the principal be held responsible for the representations and declarations of the agent?" Mr. Justice Story, in his recent valuable commentaries on the subject (page 126), lays down the general rule, and which is as applicable to special as to general agents, that, "where the acts of the agent will bind the principal, there his representations, declarations, and admissions respecting the subject matter will also bind him if made at the same time, and constituting part of the res gesta." He further observes that, "for most practical purposes, a party dealing with an agent who is acting within the scope of his authority and employment is to be considered as dealing with the principal himself. If it is the case of a contract, it is the contract of the principal. If the agent, at the time of the contract, makes any representations, declarations, or admissions touching the subject matter of the contract, it is the representation, declaration, or admission of the principal."

These principles are fully borne out by the several authorities referred to: are founded in good sense and with a just conception of the commercial and other business transactions of life from which they have been derived." This, we think, is a correct statement of the law. If a person is employed by a railway company in a special matter, as to procure signatures to a petition for the calling of an election to vote bonds in aid of such railway, the company will be bound by the representations of such agent made in any manner pertaining to his duties. In other words, a principal, by availing himself of the acts of an agent, must adopt the same in toto, and cannot adopt that which is beneficial, and reject that which is detrimental. This rule was recently applied by this court in Donisthorpe v. Fremont, E. & M. V. R. Co. (Neb.) 46 N. W. Rep. 240, and the company held responsible for the representations of the agent.

In the case at bar it is clearly shown that a number of the petitioners were induced to sign the petition by representations made on behalf of the railway company that the depot would be located on section 16. There is no pretense that the depot had been located on that section. The appellants contend that it was located on section 17, and therefore is more advantageous to some of the plaintiffs than if located on section 16. It is sufficient to say that the original proposition, under which a number of the plaintiffs were induced to sign the petition, was that the depot would be located on section 16. If the company may remove it to section 17, it may remove it to the extreme limits of the township. We cannot make a new contract for the parties. The plaintiffs are entitled to a performance of the condition under which they are induced to sign the petition for the election to vote the aid; and, as it is apparent that the company has not performed its part of the agreement, it is not entitled to the bonds.

It is contended on behalf of the appellants that fraud cannot be predicated on a promise not performed, and Perkins v. Lougee, 6 Neb. 220, is cited to sustain that position. That action was brought for the purchase money of the sale of a lot which the defendant had personally examined before purchasing, and he alleged, as a defense, that the plaintiff, to induce him to purchase the same, had falsely represented to him that he was about to erect a large brick hotel on a lot near that sold to the defendant. It was held that such promise was not actionable, and, as the party had personally viewed the lot before purchasing, that he must pay for the same. In the case at bar, however, the inducement or consideration for signing the petition calling the election was the location of the depot on section 16. The case therefore differs from that of Perkins v. Lougee.

Some objection is made to a number of the signers of the petition, on the ground that they are not freeholders. It is unnecessary to examine this question. It is sufficient to say that it is indispensable that a petition requesting the calling of an election must be signed by at least fifty freeholders, and without such petition such commissioners have no jurisdiction.

The judgment of the District Court is right, and is affirmed.

Cobb, Ch. J., concurs. Norval, J., having tried the case in the court below, took no part in the decision.

A rehearing was subsequently granted and on November 25, 1891, Cobb, Ch. J., on behalf of the court, delivered the following opinion:

This cause was brought to this court on appeal from the District Court of Seward County, was argued and submitted at a former term, the judgment of the district court affirmed, and opinion filed, which is published in the thirtieth volume of our Reports, page 877. At the last term a reargument was granted upon the application of the defendant the Fremont, Elkhorn & Missouri Valley Railroad Company. The cause was again argued and submitted at the present term. The object of the action was to restrain and enjoin the issuing and delivery of $10,000 of the bonds of K Town, in the County of Seward, claimed to have been voted by said town as a donation to the railroad company, at a special election held in said town for that purpose on the 25th day of February, 1887. The grounds of said action were: First. Fraudulent representations, promises, and inducements made by the defendant railroad company, its agents and aid solicitors, to induce sixteen of the petitioners who signed the petition asking the board of supervisors to call the special election submitting said question to the voters of said town, whereby they were induced to sign said petition, and without the signatures thus fraudulently obtained there were less than fifty legal freehold petitioners upon said petition. Second. That nine of the signers, and whose names appear on said petition, were not freeholders of said town, and that one of the names signed to said petition, to wit, John Draper, was that of an insane man, incompetent to transact any business, and that he did not sign the same, nor authorize any person to sign it for him. Third. Fraudulent representations and promises made by the agents, officers, employes, and aid agents of the defendant railroad company to voters of said K Town to vote the said bonds. Upon the trial, the finding of the court, although quite full, was general, and was equally applicable to either of the three grounds covered by the plaintiff's petition. The opinion of this court hereinbefore referred to is confined to the first proposition stated.

The statute makes it a condition precedent to the submission of a proposition to vote bonds to be donated to a work of internal improvement that a petition praying for such submission be signed by not less than fifty freeholders of the town or other municipality by which the donation is to be made. It appears by the record that fifty-six petitioners signed the petition, which was presented to the county board of Seward County praying the submission of the proposition to vote bonds to the voters of Town K, in said county. The petition upon which the cause was tried alleged that more than sixteen of the petitioners on said petition were induced and prevailed upon to sign, and did sign, said petition solely and wholly upon the promises, representations, and agreements of the defendant Fremont, Elkhorn & Missouri Valley Railroad Company, through and by its officers, agents, attorneys, employes, and aid solicitors, that, in the event of the submitting of said proposition to and the voting by said Town K of the bonds contemplated, said company would, immediately upon the completion of its said road through said town, establish and locate a permanent freight and passenger depot on its said proposed line of road within one-half mile of the center of said town, and upon section 16 therein, with other averments to the effect that by virtue of the said petition a special election was called in said Town K; that at said election the said contemplated bonds were voted; that the said railroad had been constructed through the said town, but that said defendant company has failed and refused to locate and erect such depot at or near the center of said town, or upon said section 16. As stated in the original opinion, there is a large amount of evidence tending to prove that seven of the persons who signed the said petition were induced to do so solely by the promise of persons representing said railroad company that the depot in said Town K would be located at the point named in the petition in this action. This general proposition is scarcely denied or contested by counsel in the brief on the reargument; but they contend that the persons making these promises and inducements were not authorized to bind the railroad company thereby, and that such promises and agreements were not made at such times as to become and be a part of the res gesta of the signing of said petition by the said several petitioners. There was evidence before the district court from which it would have found, and doubtless did find, that four of the signers of the petition, to wit, Wullenwaber, Sorter, Hudson, and Barthold, were induced to sign the same by promises as to the location of the said depot, made directly to them severally by J. F. Goehner; that one of said signers, to wit, Fetton, was induced to sign the said petition by promises in relation to the location of said depot, made to him by said J. F. Goehner indirectly through his co-petitioner Wullenwaber; that one of said signers, to wit, Spahr, was induced to sign said petition by promises in relation to the location of said depot, made to them severally by the said J. F. Goehner indirectly through their co-petitioners Wullenwaber, Sorter, and Hudson, and that one of said signers, to wit, Rogge, was induced to sign said petition by promises made to him by the said J. F. Goehner indirectly through his co-petitioner Hudson. It is not contended that the said J. F. Goehner had direct authority from the board of directors of the defendant railroad company to make the said promises, or any promises, to the said signers, or any of them, to induce them to sign the said petition; but it is contended, and is believed, that the evidence sufficiently proves that he was authorized by the last-named defendant, indirectly, through P. E. Hall, the superintendent of construction of the defendant railroad company, to procure the signatures of a sufficient number of the freeholders of said Town K to the petition for said election for voting bonds, and to do the necessary soliciting and electioneering for the accomplishing of that purpose; also that the petition calling for said election, and which was afterwards signed by the freeholders of said Town K, as hereinbefore stated, presented to the county board of Seward County, and upon which said election was in fact called, was, by the attorney of said company, who in concert with the said superintendent of construction was actively engaged in behalf of said railroad company in soliciting and procuring the donation of bonds to said company by the several towns upon the line of its road in Seward County, and especially of Town K, prepared and placed in the hands of said J. F. Goehner, with authority and instruction that he solely, or in connection with W. Q. Dickinson, procure the signatures of the freeholders of said Town K thereto, and take and use all of the necessary, proper, and expedient steps and measures for that purpose; and this, it is believed, conferred sufficient authority upon the said J. F. Goehner to bind the said defendant railroad company, by a promise to the signers of the petition, or those who would afterwards, in consideration thereof, become signers, that a depot of said road should be located at a designated point.

It follows, I think, that Mr. Goehner having authority as above stated, and the object to be accomplished being one of taxation of private property, yet nevertheless was of public township concern, in which one individual voter could alone accomplish but little, his authority was sufficient to operate through and by the aid of his associates, who were his neighbors, and but lately his fellow-emigrants from a foreign country. The promises, therefore, of Goehner made to Fetton, Spahr, and Rogge, through Wullenwaber, Sorter, and Hudson, were the promises of the defendant railroad company, made indirectly in two degrees by its superintendent of construction and attorney.

I might add that it appears from the evidence that many of the signers of the petition for the election were present at a public meeting, and heard the attorney of the railroad company, in a public speech, made within the general scope and plan of the company's solicitation of donations from the several towns of Seward County, and especially Town K, promise on the part of the railroad company that the said company would locate and build a freight and passenger depot within a half mile from the center of section 16, in said K Town, in Seward County. The appellant railroad company contends in the brief on rehearing that the statements and promises made to the petitioners, either directly or indirectly, by or through Goehner, are no part of the res gesta.

In the limited time at my disposal, I have been unable to find any case where the declaration of an agent has been held to be not of the res gesta because made before the final consummation of a contract; and I concede that in most of the cases the test has been whether the declaration was made at the time or so soon after the transaction or event as to forbid the conclusion that it was made as the result of study or reflection, and in view of its effect as evidence. I cannot conceive that a declaration made in the course and progress of a negotiation, and for the purpose of effecting the consummation of an agreement, is any the less a part of the res gesta because of its being made at a previous interview, shortly before the one at which such declaration or inducement resulted in the consummation of the contract.

It is also contended that because the petition was kept in the store of Mr. Dickinson, and presented to the signers by him, the promises and inducements made and held out by Goehner to procure signers to that paper cannot be considered a part of the res gesta, although Dickinson and Goehner were engaged in the common work of soliciting petitioners and voters for the common purpose of obtaining the coveted donation by K Town to the railroad company. I cannot agree to this proposition. It is not deemed necessary to add to what is said in the original opinion, as to the ratification and adoption on the part of the railroad company of the means used by the persons acting as its agents, procurers, and promoters, further than to say that a careful examination of the opinion fails to cast a doubt upon it as a correct exposition of the law in that respect. I conclude, therefore, that there is sufficient evidence in the bill of exceptions to sustain the finding of the trial court that seven of the fifty-six signers of the petition upon which the election for the bonds was called in K Town were induced to become such signers by means of the false, and, in law, fraudulent, representations of the defendant railroad company, in respect to the location and erection of the railroad depot in Town K. This number of signers being eliminated from the petition, leaves but forty-nine signers, less than the number required by statute to authorize the calling of said election.

There is another branch of the case, which, though not treated in the original opinion, is worthy of some notice. It appears from the evidence that six of the signers of the petition upon and by virtue of which the election for the issuance and donation of the railroad bonds in Town K of Seward County, was called and held, to wit, Suddith, Muir, Miner, Pederson, Schultz, and Ebberpacher, were not, nor were either of them, freeholders of said K Town at the time or date of the signing of said petition and the calling of said election, and that one of the signers of said petition, to wit, Draper, was, at the time and date of the placing of his name to the said petition, insane, and legally an inmate of the state hospital for the insane, to which he had been legally committed, and from which he had never been discharged, but was at the time in fact undischarged. Moreover, that he did not sign the said petition, but that his name was without authority written thereon by a Mr. Atwater. Thus it appears, and was evidently so found by the trial court, that there were not to exceed forty-two legal signers to the said petition. The judgment of the district court is again affirmed.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

James McKEE, Admr., etc., of Joseph M. Brown, Deceased,
v.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND & PACIFIC
R. CO., Appt.

(.....Iowa.....)

1. All ordinary and reasonable care and supervision must be used by a railroad company to keep its roadway safe for its employes.
2. A rule that no lumber, wood, stone, materials, or tools shall be placed within five feet of the rail does not apply to a wing fence at a railroad cattle-guard.
3. Placing wing fences at a cattle-guard three feet ten inches from the rails at the bottom and inclining slightly outward at the top is not negligence which will render a railroad company liable for the death of a brakeman by coming in contact with one of them while hanging low on the side of a freight car looking under it to discover what was causing stones to fly therefrom, where no such accident had ever happened before on the road or had been anticipated and no complaint had been made of the fences.
4. A brakeman must be presumed to know the distance from the rails of wing fences at cattle-guards so as to charge him with the risk of hanging low on a ladder at the side of a car in order to look under it.

(October 23, 1891.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Wayne County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Freeland & Miles, Cummins & Wright and Thomas S. Wright, for appellant:

The fair intendment of the instructions is that defendant, while it must use ordinary care, must also secure a safe condition; not a reasonably safe condition; not ordinarily safe but a safe condition. Defendant is not bound to secure safety nor provide a safe roadbed.

Burke v. Witherbee, 98 N. Y. 565; Wood, Mast. & Serv. § 334; Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Londergan, 6 West. Rep. 59, 118 Ill. 48.

Defendant was bound to anticipate, not only the emergency of a falling brake-beam, but also that the train would not be stopped to investigate the difficulty, and that a brakeman would climb down on a side ladder and project his body out from the car in an unusual position. When the act or omission complained of is not in itself a distinct wrong and can only become a wrong to any particular individual through injurious consequence resulting therefrom, this consequence must not only be shown, but it must be so connected by averment and evidence with the act or omission, as to appear to have resulted therefrom according to the ordinary course of events and as a proximate result of a sufficient cause Cooley, Torts, pp. 69, 70.

The location and construction of the cattle guard fence was "not in itself a distinct wrong." The injurious consequences did not result "according to the ordinary course of events," but through the conjunction of an extraordinary event.

See Ryan v. Railroad, 10 Ont. Rep. C. P. Div. 745; Skipp v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 9 Exch. 226.

To make the Company liable for the location and construction of this cattle-guard, it should at the time have been aware that its employes, in the usual and ordinary discharge of their duties, would be required to expose themselves to the dangers incident to such location and construction.

Koontz v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 65 Iowa, 224.

The duty resting upon the proprietor does not go to the extent of requiring him to make accidental injuries impossible.

If defendant was bound to anticipate that brake-beams would get down and that brakemen would hang down on the car ladders to inspect while the train was in motion, then the liability for this to occur is and was a risk and duty incident to the service, which risk and duty deceased assumed when he entered the service.

It was the duty of appellant to know of the dangerous proximity of the fence to the track of its road, and whether it knew or not, it is liable if it could have known by the exercise of reasonable diligence.

It was not the duty of the deceased to investigate for himself, or determine the condition of the appliance furnished him, or the distance of the fence from the track. He was not required to know whether appellant's road had been safely and properly constructed, nor was he required to know of all defects and obstructions that existed on the line of road over which he run, but he had, without investigation, the right to assume that they were safe and sufficient for the purpose, and that appellant had discharged its duties towards its employes.

R. Co.* 8 West. Rep. 297, 88 Mo. 806.

The deceased did not assume the risk caused by the dangerous proximity of the fence to the track unless he knew of the danger.

Scanlon v. Boston & A. R. Co., Pidcock v. Union Pac. R. Co. and Honic v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. supra.

The knowledge of the deceased as to the dangerous proximity of the fence cannot be presumed in proof of his contributory negligence but must be proven by appellant.

It was not negligence on the part of the deceased not to be on the lookout for the fence that caused his death unless he knew of its dangerous proximity to the track, and there is no evidence that he possessed such knowledge.

Kearns v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co., Chicago & I. R. Co. v. Russell and Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Johnson, supra; Northern Cent. R. Co. v. State, 31 Md. 857; Lewis v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 38 Md. 588; Johnson v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. supra.

If there was any question as to whether the deceased had any knowledge as to the near proximity of the fence to the track of appellant's road, if there was any evidence tending to show such knowledge or contributory negligence on his part, the determination of that question became a question for the jury, and was properly submitted to it by the court.

Although the deceased may have known of the near proximity of the fence in question to the track, that of itself could not prevent a recovery in this case, unless the same was so close, to his knowledge, that it would be necessarily dangerous to the mind of a prudent person to use the side ladder under the circumstances as shown in this case.

Robinson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In September, 1888, Joseph M. Brown was in the employ of defendant as brakeman on a freight train. The division on which he worked extended from Trenton, in Missouri, to Eldon, in this State. On the 20th day of the month named, he left Trenton with his train. When it reached the vicinity of Numa he was in the caboose, and, observing stones which appeared to be thrown from the track under the second car from the caboose, he went forward to ascertain the cause. He first went down on the north side of the car, and then climbed back, and went down on the south side by means of the sideladder. While hanging low on the ladder, with his back towards the locomotive, looking under the car, his head came in contact with a wing fence at the end of a cattle-guard, and he was instantly killed. This action is brought by the administrator of his estate to recover the resulting damages.

It is claimed by plaintiff that the defendant was negligent in allowing the fence to be placed so near the track as it was, and that decedent was killed in consequence, and without fault on his part. Defendant denies the alleged negligence on its part, and the alleged absence of negligence on the part of decedent, and alleges that he had been employed by defendant on the part of its road where the accident occurred for several years; that during that time the fence and cattle-guard of which complaint is made were not changed, and were like the other cattle-guards and appurtenances along that part of its road,—all of which was well known to decedent long prior to his death.

1. The court charged the jury as follows: "It is the duty of a railroad company, as regards its employees, to use all ordinary care and supervision to keep its roadway, for the operation of its trains by its employees, in a good and safe condition, so that the employees may not be exposed to unnecessary hazards in the operation of its trains." "The deceased had a right to assume that the defendant would use all reasonable care in the keeping of its road in a good and safe condition, for the operation of its trains by its employees.

"Defendant complains of the portions of the charge quoted, on the ground that they require defendant to keep its road in a safe condition, while the rule is that it must be kept in a reasonably safe condition. We do not think the jury would so understand the charge. It instructed them that it was the duty of defendant to use all ordinary and all reasonable care and supervision to keep its roadway safe, and that, we think, is the law. If the road could have been made safe by such means, then it was the duty of defendant to make it so.

2. The only charge of wrong against defendant is that it negligently placed the fence with which decedent came in contact too close to the track. That it was a proper appurtenance of the road is not questioned. The evidence shows that all the cattle-guards and cattle-guard fences along the line of defendant's railway, upon which decedent had been employed, were constructed substantially alike. As we understand the record, each cattle-guard was made by digging a pit across the roadbed, about eight feet wide and two feet deep. Across the pit were placed timbers, and on them were laid ties from twelve to fourteen feet in length. At each end of the ties was constructed a wing fence eight feet in length, parallel to the track. It was made of two posts, and boards nailed thereon and to its center was attached the right-of-way fence. The posts of the wing fences inclined outward somewhat, but, as a rule, were nearly perpendicular to the surface of the earth, and were from three feet five inches to four feet seven inches from the rails. The fence which caused the accident in question was three feet ten inches from the rail at the bottom, and inclined outward at the top three inches. There is no competent evidence that it was improperly constructed or located. Certain rules of defendant, designed for the guidance of its track repairers, were, however, introduced in evidence, over the objections of defendant. One of the rules so introduced is as follows: "(2) They must see that no lumber, wood, stone, materials or tools are placed, at any time, within five feet of the rail, and that all gravel and ballast is leveled so as not to endanger the safety of the trains." It is urged by appellee that this rule is evidence that a wing fence should not be placed within five feet of the track and it is claimed that, if the one in question had been placed that distance from it, the accident would not have occurred. But the rule cannot be given the effect claimed for it. It evidently does not refer to permanent structures, but to loose tools and materials. There would be good reason for requiring articles which might be readily moved by the wind, by animals, or other cause, without the concurrence and against the wish of defendant, to be placed further from the track than appurtenances of the road, which are permanently attached to the earth or roadbed. Other rules required the track repairers to examine their sections daily to ascertain if the track was safe, and to observe closely the fences, and to keep them and the cattle-guards in good repair. It is not claimed that the fence in question was not in good order, and the rules gave the repairers no authority to move it. The rules were therefore improperly admitted. The jury were instructed that they could not presume negligence from the fact that the accident occurred, but there was no other evidence of such negligence.

3. It is said, however, that the cattle-guard and fence could, with reasonable care, have been so constructed that decedent would have passed the fence in safety. That may be conceded, and the question then arises whether the accident was of such a nature that defendant should have guarded against it. The stones and ballast which had attracted the attention of decedent, and caused him to descend the ladder on the side of the car, and look under it, were thrown out by a brake beam which was down and dragging. The evidence shows that, in operating trains, it sometimes happens that a brake-beam or other appurtenance of the trucks of a car gets out of order. When there are indications that such a state of affairs exists, it is the duty of the brakeman who discovers it to report the fact to the conductor, and under his direction to ascertain what, if anything, requires attention, and, if necessary, to stop the train. To make the required examination, it may be proper for the brakeman to descend the ladder at the end or on the side of a car, and look under it while the train is in motion. But the evidence does not show that such an event is of common occurrence, and it does show without contradiction that it is not customary for a brakeman to descend the side of a car while it is in motion between stations. It does not appear that any accident caused by the location of a wing fence had ever happened on the road of defendant before that in question, although its road had been operated many years.

The undisputed facts of this case bring it within the rule announced in Koontz v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 65 Iowa, 228. The facts involved in that case were substantially as follows: A train of the defendant was stopped on a bridge because the engineer supposed that some of the cars were off the track, or that one of the brakes was set. A brakeman who had been riding in the cab of the engine got down, and in the discharge of his duty proceeded to walk back beside the train to ascertain what cause, if any, there was, for stopping. While so engaged he fell through the bridge, and received injuries which caused his death. This court held that it was not the duty of the railway company to plank every bridge and cattle-guard to prevent accidents to its employés, although it might have anticipated that trains would be required to stop at other than the usual stopping places; and it was said that "ordinary care does not require that every possible contingency must be anticipated and guarded against, but only such as are likely to occur." That such is the rule applicable to cases of this kind is well settled by the authorities.

In Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Locke, 112 Ind. 404, it is stated as follows: "The duty imposed does not require the use of every possible precaution to avoid injury to individuals, nor that the company should have employed any particular means which it may appear, after the accident, would have avoided it. It was only required to use such reasonable precautions to prevent accidents as would have been adopted by prudent persons prior to the accident."

In Loftus v. Union Ferry Co., 84 N. Y. 459, the material facts involved were as follows: A child six years of age fell from a bridge or float adjoining the passageway for passengers going upon or leaving the ferry-boat, into the water, and was drowned, in consequence of an alleged defect in the guard at the side of the bridge or float. The guard, at the time of the accident, was in the condition it had been in for years. Many people had passed that place yearly, and no accident like that complained of had happened before. The court held that the ferry company was bound to provide suitable and safe accommodations for the landing of passengers, and that the rule of strictest diligence in that respect was the only one consistent with a due regard to the value of human life, and with the relations of the company to the public. It further held that "the rule does not impose upon the defendant the duty of so providing for the safety of passengers that they shall encounter no possible danger, and meet with no casualty, in the use of the appliances provided by it. It was possible for the defendant so to have constructed the guard that such an accident as this could not have happened, and this, so far as appears, could have been done without unreasonable expense or trouble. If the defendant ought to have foreseen that such an accident might happen, or if such an accident could reasonably have been anticipated, the omission to provide against it would be actionable negligence." The company was held not liable, because it appeared that it had no reason to apprehend an accident like that for which it was sought to make it liable, and that the arrangements it had made were such as experience had, up to that time, shown to be safe and suitable, and sufficient to meet the requirements of its duty.

In Sjogren v. Hall, 58 Mich. 274, a case in which an employé in a steam saw-mill sought to recover for injuries sustained in the course of his employment, the Supreme Court of Michigan said it was the duty of the mill-owner to guard against probable dangers, not to make accidental injuries impossible. It was further stated, in effect, that the fact that the employé who was not wanting in intelligence nor incapable of judging of probable danger, continued to expose himself without hesitation, and apparently without fear to such risks as those were, was very conclusive proof either that the employer was not culpable in the matter complained of, or that the employé was inexcusably careless of his own safety. It was further said, in effect, that the fact that, after the accident occurred, it was seen that it could have been easily guarded against, was no reason for holding the employer liable.

To have guarded against the accident in controversy, it was necessary for defendant to foresee that something might occur to one of its moving trains which would make it proper for an employé to descend a car to look beneath it, and that he would descend, and swing himself out from the car while passing a wing fence, to make the desired examination. It is undoubtedly true that defendant might readily have known that such a combination of circumstances was possible, but it is apparent that it was not likely to occur. So far as the record shows, the accident in question was so improbable, and it was due to causes of such rare occurrence, that defendant, in the exercise of reasonable diligence, was not required to provide against it. It is readily seen now how it could have been avoided, but it does not appear that anyone anticipated it, or anything of that nature. It is not shown that complaint of the wing fences was ever made to the defendant, nor that it had any reason to anticipate accidents from them. They were properly constructed, so far as the record discloses, and defendant had reason to believe, from the length of time during which it had operated the road without accident from them, that they were properly located.

4. Another objection to a recovery by plaintiff on the record submitted is that it clearly appears the accident would have been avoided by the use of ordinary care on the part of decedent. He had been employed as brakeman on the division on which the accident occurred in all about three years, and his runs were usually made in daylight. On that division there were about 400 wing fences, all of which were substantially like that in question, as to plan of construction and distance from the track. The distance between the wing fences and the sides of passing box-cars was about two feet, and it is shown without contradiction that the side ladders could be used with safety in examining as to the condition of trains in passing the wing fences in question. But it must have been apparent to anyone who had observed the width of the spaces between the fences and passing cars, that a person could not safely swing out from a car while passing such a fence, on its level, more than two feet, and that an attempt to do so would be apt to result in serious injury. It is said that there is no evidence that decedent knew the distance of the fence from the passing car, but that claim is in conflict with the approved rules of evidence. It was said in Muldoney v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 39 Iowa, 630, that "the means of knowing by ordinary care is evidence of knowledge." If it be shown that a given statement was made in the presence and hearing of a person possessed of the ability to hear, the presumption, conclusive in the absence of a showing to the contrary, is that he heard it. If it be shown that an event, capable of being seen by any ordinary observer, occurred in the presence of a person possessed of the ability to see, and that his attention was at the time directed to it, it will be presumed, until the contrary appears, that he saw it. So a person engaged in a particular employment will be presumed to have that knowledge of the dangers incident to his employment which he could have acquired by the use of ordinary diligence.

In Mayer v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 68 Iowa, 568, it was shown that the plaintiff's intestate was a switchman or brakeman in the employment of the defendant, and that his death was caused by the negligence of defendant in failing to place blocks between the rails and the guard-rails at the switches. It was said by this court, in effect, that the knowledge of defects possessed by an employé, and his ability in the exercise of ordinary diligence to acquire knowledge thereof, are questions of fact to be determined on the evidence submitted in cases where the defects or dangers are not open and obvious to everyone serving in the capacity of an employé; but that the rule was not applicable to that case, for the reason that the decedent had worked over the track in question for six weeks, and must be presumed to have known of the defect, and that it was dangerous. The plaintiff in Money v. Lower Vein Coal Co., 55 Iowa, 671, sought to recover for injuries received from a falling roof while working as a miner in the mine of defendant. This court held as follows: "The true rule is that if the plaintiff knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known, of the unsafe condition of the roof, and he continued to work in the dangerous place without protest or complaint, and without being induced to believe that a change would be made, he assumed the risk, and cannot recover." In Muldoney v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., supra, this court approved the following: "When an employé has the means of acquiring knowledge, by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, of the defects or imperfections in the machinery or cars about or upon which he is employed, and continues in his employer's service without objecting to or protesting against the use of such defective or imperfect cars or machinery, he will be held to have assumed all the risks incident to the use of the cars and machinery in such defective condition." The court cited a large number of cases as supporting the rule. In Perigo v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 52 Iowa, 276, it appeared that the defendant had erected a coal platform between two of its tracks at Winterset, and, for convenience in unloading and taking on coal, placed it so near one of the tracks that a passenger-car, moving along the track, passed within seven inches of the platform at one end, and within four and a half inches of it at the other end. The platform had been in the position described two years, when a baggage-man in the employment of the defendant, while engaged in the discharge of his duties in helping to make up a train, was knocked off the car by the coal platform, thereby receiving injuries which resulted in his death. He had been in that employment for more than two years, and had assisted in making up the train during nearly every day of that time. In considering an instruction in which the rule under consideration was stated, the court said: "It is now the established doctrine of this court, in harmony with the current of authority elsewhere, that an employé who knows, or by the exercise of ordinary diligence could know, of any defects or imperfections in the things about which he is employed, and continues in the service without objection, and without promise of change, is presumed to have assumed all the consequences resulting from such defects, and to have waived all right to recover for injuries caused thereby."

The rule, as thus stated, was approved in Wells v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co., 56 Iowa, 524. The facts involved in that case were that the plaintiff's intestate was a brakeman in the employment of defendant, and had been so engaged for more than four years upon that part of its road where the accident occurred. He was killed by being knocked from the top of a freight train by the timbers of a bridge over which the train was passing. The bridge timbers with which he came in contact were a little more than five feet above the top of the car, while he was more than six feet in height. There were other bridges of like construction and height on that part of the road, over which he had often passed. In the opinion written by Beck, J., it was held that an instruction embodying the rule under consideration should have been given. It was also said, in regard to the dangers of the employment, that "the knowledge of the intestate and his failure to make objections may be shown by circumstances and inferred from his conduct. Direct proof on these points is not required. The knowledge of the dangerous character of the bridge may be inferred from opportunities of obtaining such knowledge in the exercise of ordinary care."

In Gould v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co., 66 Iowa, 590, it appeared that the plaintiff's intestate, a locomotive engineer in the employment of the defendant, was fatally injured while in the discharge of his duties. He had been instructed to make a certain trip without stopping at any station, unless signaled or specially directed so to do. It was the duty of the conductor or brakeman to make signals to the engineer from the rear end of the train when passing stations. While the train was passing a station on the trip the engineer went to the fireman's side of the engine, and leaned out of the gangway, looking back for the expected signal. He was almost instantly struck by a water crane, and injured as stated. The water crane, or the frame supporting it, was about two feet from the floor of the gangway upon which the engineer was standing when he was struck. This court approved an instruction to the effect that, if the crane was so located as to be reasonably safe for trainmen operating trains in a reasonably safe and prudent manner, then the defendant was not guilty of negligence in the location of the crane, and disapproved one which stated, in effect, that, if the crane was placed in such close proximity to the track as to be dangerous to the persons operating the trains, then defendant might be found guilty of negligence in locating and erecting it. In considering that instruction, the court, again speaking by Beck, Ch. J., stated that "it is not true that a railroad company is to be regarded as negligent in erecting or maintaining contrivances or things for use in the operation of their roads, for the reason that they are dangerous to the persons operating the trains. 18 L. R. A.

Indeed, the whole business of operating trains is dangerous. It is full of perils to those employed therein. Because there is danger, it does not follow that the companies are negligent as to the things from which the danger springs. The instruction should have expressed the thought that, if the crane was dangerous to persons operating trains in the exercise of ordinary care, the defendant was negligent in constructing it."

The rule under consideration is too well grounded in reason and authority, and has been too long followed by this court without dissent, to be now abandoned. When applied to the facts in this case, its effect cannot be a matter of doubt. The decedent during his long term of service on the road in question, could not have failed to observe, in the use of ordinary diligence, that the wing fences were too near the track to permit a person to swing out from the bottom of the passing car with safety. This is especially true if the trainmen were required to descend the sides of moving cars, and look beneath them, as was done in this case, so frequently that defendant should be charged with knowledge of such examinations, and be required to provide for them. Decedent may not have known the exact distance of any wing fence from the track, but he could not have avoided knowing that he could not safely do that which he attempted if he had given the matter that attention which his duty to his employer and to himself demanded. The accident occurred at about noon of a pleasant day. The track where it occurred was straight. There were no obstructions, and decedent could have seen the fence which caused his death, from his position at the bottom of the ladder, for a distance of 930 feet before it was reached. There was nothing in the condition of the car which he sought to examine, as it appeared at the time, to justify him in exposing himself to any unusual risk. There was nothing to indicate such an impending danger to the employes or property of defendant, nor to passengers, as justified decedent in acting without regard to his own safety. It appears that a break-beam or lever, or a break loose and dragging, might have thrown the stones from the track, or that a swing-beam might have thrown them from ballast filled in too full. It is not shown that when stones were thrown as were those in question it was regarded as indicating unusual danger, or anything of a serious nature, although it made an examination as to the condition of the train necessary. That decedent was not alarmed by what he saw is shown by what he did. It was his duty to report to the conductor if he saw anything wrong with the train. He made no report in this case, but proceeded without orders, evidently not for the purpose of averting an apparent and impending danger, but to ascertain if one existed. The conductor and a fellow-brakeman were near him in the caboose when he left it, but he did not regard the cause of his leaving of sufficient importance to call their attention to it.

In Hosie v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co., 75 Iowa, 686, it appeared that a brakeman was injured in attempting to set a brake in obedience to a signal which was unusual, and indicated that prompt action was required. It was held that under the facts of that case, the brakeman was justified in attempting to obey the signal, although in so doing he knowingly incurred risk to himself; but the rule of that and similar cases has no application to this case. It clearly appears from the undisputed facts of the case and the authorities cited that defendant is not shown to have been negligent in the provision it has made for the safety of its employes in the matter in controversy. The case of Loftus v. Union Ferry Co., supra, is even authority for the conclusion that it has exercised that higher degree of care which a passenger might have demanded. On the other hand, it appears that, had decedent used reasonable care to ascertain and avoid the danger to which he exposed himself, the accident which caused his death could not have occurred. What we have said disposes of all questions discussed by counsel which are likely to arise on another trial.

For the reasons indicated the judgment of the District Court is reversed.

Beck, Ch. J., dissenting:

1. The undisputed evidence shows that plaintiff's intestate, Joseph M. Brown, had been for several months employed as a brakeman upon trains running on that part of the road where the accident resulting in his death occurred. The deceased, being in the cupola of the caboose, while the train was running in daylight under ordinary conditions, saw stones flying from the ballast of the roadbed, so that they could be seen by him from the cupola. He knew from this indication that some part of the car was coming in contact with the roadbed, and thereupon went upon the top of the car, thence down its side upon the ladder, and returned to the top, went down the ladder on the other side, and swinging himself from the ladder so that he could do so, looked under the car to see what part of it was dragging upon the roadbed. While in this position, his head came in contact with the upright part of a cattle-guard, and he was instantly killed. There was a panel of fence extending along the cattle-guard on the side furthest from the track, to the middle of which the fence was attached. The fence was three feet ten inches from the rail at the bottom, and four feet and one inch at the top. Other cattle-guards varied, as to the distance from the rails, but little one way or the other from this measurement. It was found that a brake-beam was down, and was dragging upon the roadbed, which caused the stones to be thrown off the track. The deceased was looking backward when he was killed. He was not directed by the conductor to examine and report as to the cause of the stones flying from the track. There was evidence tending to show that an ordinary freight-car projects about two feet beyond the rail, and that it was the duty of a brakeman, upon observing indications of a brake-beam or the like being down, to examine into the matter and ascertain the cause of the indications, and this could be done only by looking under the car in the manner deceased attempted.

2. Was it the duty of deceased, upon observing indications of parts of the car or machinery near the track being out of order, to ascertain what was the cause of the indications in order to prevent injury to the train from the defective parts of the car? Evidence was submitted to the jury to the effect that upon such an occurrence it was customary for the brakeman to do just as the deceased attempted to do, namely, descend the ladder, and obtain a view of the parts under the car, so that whatever was necessary to avoid danger could be done. A witness for the defendant testified that it was the duty of deceased to report the fact to the conductor, and from him have orders to descend the side of the car. But, if it be assumed that he should have pursued this course, it does not follow he was negligent in acting without the conductor's orders. It was a case of the discharge of duty without waiting for orders. It is very plain that the emergency required prompt action; that the deceased acted just as the emergency required. Now to hold that the deceased, because he did the act he would have been required to do had he reported to the conductor, was negligent, would condemn him for prompt intelligence and faithful services, intended to protect the property of defendant and the lives of himself and other trainmen. But we cannot hold that, in such a case, a trainman must, before he acts, report for orders. Such a rule would often expose life and property to destruction, for in the management of trains which move at a high rate of speed promptness and celerity of action are to be commended, indeed required, in the right discharge of duty by the trainmen. I need not further present reasons for holding that the deceased, in the discharge of his duty, descended the ladder, and attempted to see the parts of the car out of order. But I may repeat what I have before intimated, that preservation of human life and protection to the property of defendant required deceased to do this duty, and do it promptly.

3. Now if it were the duty of deceased to descend the ladder and look under the car, it cannot be doubted that defendant was required to construct the cattle-guards so that his life would not be destroyed in the discharge of duty. Therefore, if the parts of the cattle-guard were so near the car as to expose the body of deceased to contact therewith, they were negligently constructed. A great deal more could be said upon these points, but I refrain from continuing their discussion.

4. It is insisted that, as the act done by defendant was rarely demanded, the indications—the flying of the stones—were something unusual, and the defendant was not required to anticipate the occurrence, and so provide that danger to its employes would not result therefrom. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that the occurrence of the brake-beam or other timber under the car being down is so unusual that it could not or ought not to have been anticipated. Indeed the evidence tends to show that such things were quite familiar to at least one witness who had been a trainman; and it is a matter of common knowledge that the timber and irons of the machinery and trucks are exposed to breaking, and from other causes they become out of order. Timbers, irons or stones, not connected with cars may become fastened to parts of the trucks, and other things of this character may occur, all of which would, if not removed, cause destruction of property and of life. The character of these dangers can only be known by a view under the cars. Now, surely the defendant ought so to construct its track, cars and cattle-guards that a trainman may in safety so act when such occasions arise that life and property will be protected. The evidence in this case shows that the part of the cattle-guard was about two feet and two inches from the side of the car, and probably even less from the ladder upon which deceased was supporting himself when he was killed. The jury were authorized to find that deceased was killed while in the discharge of his duty, and that the discharge of that duty, and duty of that character, may be required at any time, or at any place, upon a moving train, and therefore that danger from cattle-guards so near the track should have been anticipated and provided against by defendant. The cases and authorities cited in the majority opinion are not in conflict with these views and conclusions.

5. It was the duty of defendant to so construct the cattle-guard as not to endanger the safety or life of the employes operating trains on the railroad, and, under familiar rules, intestate was authorized to believe that defendant had done its duty in this regard and to believe that no danger of the character caused by the cattle-guard existed. He could rest in this belief, and act accordingly until he obtained actual knowledge that the danger existed. Muldowney v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 86 Iowa, 468; Kearns v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 66 Iowa, 599; Snow v. Housatonic R. Co. 8 Allen, 441; Gibson v. Pacific R. Co. 46 Mo. 163; Faren v. Sellers, 39 La. Ann. 1011; St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. v. Irwin, 37 Kan. 701; Dorsey v. Phillips, 42 Wis. 588; Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Sweet, 45 Ill. 197; Porter v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 71 Mo. 66; Lewis v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. 59 Mo. 506; Petty v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 88 Mo. 306, 8 West. Rep. 297; Devlin v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. 87 Mo. 545, 4 West. Rep. 54.

6. If deceased knew, or could have known in the exercise of reasonable diligence, the danger to which he exposed himself by attempting to discharge the duty he undertook to protect defendant's property, by descending the ladder in order to discover the cause of the stones from the roadbed flying out from under the car, and thus voluntarily put his life at hazard, he was negligent, and thereby contributed to the injury resulting in his own death, and his representative cannot recover. But there is no evidence tending to show that he had such knowledge, or that in the exercise of reasonable diligence he could have acquired it. It is not shown that he or any other employé of defendant knew the distance the fences of the cattle-guards were from the cars or the rails, nor that he or they knew just what distance between the car and the fence would enable one to do what he attempted to do with safety, or what distance would render the act dangerous. It is not shown that any employé of defendant or the deceased had any reason to believe that he exposed himself to danger from the fences by attempting to look under the car. It is a case where the employes and witnesses of defendant are exceeding wise after a life has been sacrificed and measurements have been made. No one appears to have thought of the danger before. This very view is taken in the opinion of the majority to excuse defendant's negligence, namely, that the accident was so improbable and unexpected that defendant cannot be regarded as negligent in maintaining the fence so near the car; but the victim of the accident is to be held by the majority of the court to have been negligent for not knowing the danger, while the defendant is to be held free of negligence because the accident could not have been anticipated. I protest against such discrimination in favor of defendant. The simple facts are that the fence was dangerously near the track, and there is no evidence tending to show that the intestate knew it, or that in the exercise of reasonable diligence he could have acquired knowledge of such fact. The considerations distinguish the case from Mayes v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 63 Iowa, 562; Gould v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 66 Iowa, 590; Wells v. Burlington C. R. & N. R. Co. 56 Iowa, 524, and other like cases cited in the majority opinion as applicable on this point.

In my opinion the judgment of the district court ought to be affirmed.

Jennie JACQUES

v.

GREAT FALLS MANUFACTURING CO.

(.....N.H.....)

1. A nonsuit is properly refused in an action to recover damages for personal injuries where the evidence shows that plaintiff was a weaver having charge of looms in defendant's mill; that a shuttle could not fly out of a loom unless the machinery was defective or out of repair; that plaintiff had no knowledge of and was not permitted to meddle with the machinery but in case it appeared out of repair must inform a person employed for the purpose of repairing looms; that on the day of the accident one of the looms did not work right, the shuttle flying out and sticking; that the loom-fixer was called three times to repair the loom, and after making what repairs he thought necessary each time again set the loom running; that plaintiff watched the loom more closely than the others because afraid of its action, and that shortly after it was fixed the last time a shuttle flew out inflicting the injury complained of.

2. A loom-fixer in a cotton mill, whose duty is to look after the looms and keep them in proper repair, is not the fellow servant of weavers employed at the looms, within the rule that the master is not liable for injuries received through the negligence of a fellow servant.

(July 31, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the trial term of the Supreme Court for Strafford County (Carpenter, J.,) made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Exceptions overruled.

Plaintiff was employed by defendant as a weaver in its cotton mills having charge of six looms.

The further facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. W. S. & D. R. Pierce, for defendant:

In McAndrews v. Burns, 89 N. J. L. 117, Mr. Justice Dalrimple defined common employment to be service of such kind that, in the exercise of common sagacity, all who engage in it may be able to foresee, when accepting it, that through the negligence of fellow servants it may probably expose them to injury.

Thompson, in his work on Negligence, vol. 2, § 87, p. 1084, adds, after citing the above definition: "The more general view seems to be, that all servants in the employ of the same master, under the same general control, and engaged in promoting the same common object,—such as operating a railroad or a mine,—are to be deemed fellow servants engaged in the same common employment; and if so, the fact that they are engaged in different departments of the same service does not take the case out of the rule."

John C. Burke, the loom-fixer, having been engaged in the same common employment with the plaintiff, was a fellow servant.

Messrs. Russell & Boyer, for plaintiff:

The question of negligence is one of fact to be found by the jury from the evidence submitted under proper instructions from the court.

The evidence was sufficient to raise a reasonable presumption of guilt on the part of the defendants in the minds of the jury.

Burke was not the fellow servant of the plaintiff.

He to whom the corporation delegates any duty it has to perform towards its servants while in the performance of such duty stands in the place of, and, as to those affected by that duty, is the corporation itself to all intents and purposes.

That defendants would perform this duty imposed by law, to the plaintiff in respect to the supply and maintenance of proper machinery, was a part of their contract with the plaintiff, implied by law from the relation of master and servant, existing between plaintiff and defendants.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The motion for nonsuit presents the question whether the jury could properly find a verdict for the plaintiff upon the evidence submitted. Paine v. Grand Trunk R. 58 N. H. 611. The evidence produced by the plaintiff—that the shuttle would not fly out of a loom unless the machinery was defective or out of repair; that the plaintiff had no knowledge of the machinery, and was not allowed to meddle with it, and, in case it did not operate properly, was required to call on Burke, a loom-fixer employed by the defendant to look after the looms operated by the plaintiff, and keep them in proper repair; that the shuttle flew out of one of her looms about 10 o'clock in the forenoon of the day of the injury, and she notified Burke, who examined it, made whatever repairs he thought necessary, and set it running; that at 11 o'clock the shuttle caught in the "binder" or in the "picker" and she again called on Burke, who again examined the loom, repaired it, and put it in operation; and shortly after, and before 12 o'clock, the shuttle flew out, and struck her, putting out one of her eyes; and that she had watched the loom more closely than the others, because its action made her afraid of it,—was evidence tending to show that the plaintiff, exercising reasonable care, was injured by the defendant's negligence in failing to provide suitable machinery for her use; and, in the absence of rebutting evidence, was sufficient to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff. The motion for a nonsuit was properly denied.

The defendant excepted to the refusal to instruct the jury that Burke, the section-hand and loom-fixer, being engaged in the same common employment and under the same general control, was a fellow servant of the plaintiff, and that the defendant was not liable for his negligence. As the servant assumes the ordinary risks of his employment, including the negligence of his fellow servants, the master is not responsible to the servant for injuries happening from that cause. But the rule of law which exempts the master from responsibility for such injuries does not relieve him from the duty which he owes to the servant to provide suitable and safe machinery and appliances for the use of the servant in his employment. Fifield v. Northfield R. 42 N. H. 225; Hanley v. Grand Trunk R. Co. 62 N. H. 274; Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. 110 Mass. 240, 260; Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. 100 U. S. 218, 25 L. ed. 612. This duty may be, and in case the employer is a corporation must always be, discharged by agents and servants; and that the agent or servant charged with its performance, whatever his rank of service may be, stands in the place of the employer, who thereby becomes responsible for the acts and chargeable with the negligence of such agent or servant. In many kinds of service the care and keeping of tools and machinery in a condition of safety requires merely the attention and repairs occasioned by ordinary use and wear, and is properly a part of the regular business of the servant engaged in the use of such tools and machinery. In such cases the duty of the employer is performed by furnishing safe tools and machinery, and the means of making needed repairs, and the duty of making the repairs may be intrusted to servants, and any neglect in the performance of this service is the negligence of a servant. McGee v. Boston Cordage Co. 189 Mass. 445. But in cases where skill and practical knowledge are required in keeping machinery in a reasonable condition as to safety, beyond what is needed in operating it, it is the duty of the employer to supply the necessary intelligence, skill, and experience in the care and inspection of the machinery to protect the servants from injury; and for any failure to exercise proper care and skill the employer is accountable.

The question who are fellow servants, within the rule exempting the employer from consequences of the negligence of fellow servants, is not ordinarily determined by rank or grade of service, but by the character of the service performed or acts complained of. As a general rule, those doing the work of a servant are fellow servants, whatever their grade of service; and a servant, of whatever rank, charged with the performance of the master's duty towards his servants, is, as to the discharge of that duty, a vice-principal, for whose acts and neglects the master is responsible, because he has invested him with the responsibility of doing that which the master is bound to have carefully performed. Moynihan v. Hills Co. 146 Mass. 586, 593, 6 New Eng. Rep. 13 L. R. A.

The test whether the plaintiff and Burke were fellow servants was not whether they were engaged in the common employment of manufacturing cotton cloth under the same general control and paid by the same principal, but whether Burke represented the defendant in the responsibility or performance of any duty which it owed to the plaintiff. It was the duty of the defendant to furnish suitable machinery, and keep it in suitable condition, for the plaintiff's use. The duty of keeping the looms in proper repair required experience and the exercise of mechanical skill, and was specially intrusted to Burke, and, so far as the discharge of that duty was concerned, Burke represented the defendant, and any negligence on his part in the performance of that duty was the negligence of the defendant. It is immaterial that Burke exercised no control or authority over the plaintiff. The negligence of the defendant complained of was not in ordering the plaintiff into a place of danger, but in failing to use ordinary care to prevent the exposure of the plaintiff to unusual hazard in her ordinary employment.

OLCOTT FALLS CO.

(65 N. H. 290.)

1. The right of a riparian owner to construct dams and divert for manufac-

NOTE.—Navigable waters; floatage of logs.

Early Massachusetts decisions sustain the conclusions of the principal case and hold that property rights situate near water highways are subject to the rights and equities of the general public in so far as free passage to and fro on the waters of the stream are concerned. Com. v. Essex Co. 13 Gray, 248; Stoughton v. Baker, 4 Mass. 522; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 100.

A similar contention has been sustained by the supreme courts of both Maine and New Hampshire. Parks v. Morse, 52 Me. 290; Veazie v. Dwinel, 50 Me. 479; Lancoy v. Clifford, 54 Me. 487; Treat v. Lord, 42 Me. 552; Knox v. Chaloner, 42 Me. 150; Thompson v. Androscoggin River Imp. Co. 54 N. H. 558.

It is within the province of the Legislature to determine and regulate the use of all common and public rights and easements. The rights of navigation on tide-waters and of the use of streams not navigable for boats and rafts, are public, and such rights are subject to regulation. Where the full enjoyment of two public rights threaten to interfere with each other, it is for the Legislature to determine which shall yield, and to what extent; and such question will ordinarily be determined by the preponderance of public necessity and con-turing purposes, the water of a stream which is used by the public for floating logs is limited by the extent to which it can be done without interfering with the public rights, which are measured by the capacity of the stream in its natural condition.

2. The right of the public to float logs on a stream will not be presumed to have been relinquished by the grant of a charter to a manufacturing corporation, giving power to purchase and hold real estate on the stream, improve the water-power, and make and maintain on or across the stream the works necessary to accomplish the corporate objects, unless such relinquishment is absolutely necessary to the exercise of the corporate franchises.
3. The mere fact of the insertion in certain corporate charters of a prohibition to interfere with the navigation of streams is no ground for construing a charter which does not contain such prohibition as authorizing such interference where it would be advantageous to the corporation.
4. Legislative authority to a manufacturing company to purchase, hold, and enjoy the powers and privileges of a corporation which had been organized to construct a canal around the falls in a stream used by the public for floating logs, subject to the duties and liabilities binding on said "rights, powers, and privileges," will subject the manufacturing corporation to a limitation which had been imposed upon the company not to interfere with the free passage of lumber down the stream.

5. The abandonment by the State of the public right to float logs down a stream when it grants a manufacturing corporation the right to make use of the water-power thereon, will not be inferred from the fact that the manufacturing business may be more important than the lumber business.
6. The mere conveyance by the State of the bed of a stream, which has been used by the public for floating logs, will not operate as a relinquishment of the public right. To have that effect the intention must be distinctly expressed.
7. Equity has jurisdiction of a bill to determine as between the public and riparian mill-owners the proper form, dimensions and place in a mill-dam of a sluice for running logs on the stream; and the suit is not barred by the fact that the dam is already erected.
8. If a judicial location of a log-way venience. The most common case is that where each is required to yield in part, as in the case of a bridge over a navigable river, furnished with a draw, to be raised for the passage of vessels, at the expense of the bridge owners, or by the navigators desiring to pass it. Com. v. Essex Co. 79 Mass. 230.

The public right of floatage, and the private right of the riparian proprietors, must each be exercised with due consideration for the other, and any injury which the latter receives in consequence of a proper use of the stream for floatage, he must submit to as incident to his situation upon navigable waters. Middleton v. Flat River Boom. Co. 27 Mich. 533.

Each right modifies the other, and may, perhaps, render it less valuable; but this fact, if the enjoyment of the right is in itself reasonable and considerate, can furnish no ground for complaint. Gould v. Boston Duck Co. 13 Gray, 452; Snow v. Parsons, 28 Vt. 459. To the same effect is White River Log & Boom. Co. v. Nelson, 45 Mich. 578. See also People's Ice Co. v. The Excelsior, 44 Mich. 229; Weise v. Smith, 3 Or. 445, 8 Am. Rep. 621.

The right to float logs on navigable streams is recognized in Lorman v. Benson, 8 Mich. 52; Thunder Bay River Boom. Co. v. Speechly, 31 Mich. 344; Middleton v. Flat River Boom. Co. 27 Mich. 533; Atty-Gen. v. Ewart Boom. Co. 34 Mich. 462; Brig "City of Erie" v. Canfield, 27 Mich. 482.

The right of navigation is superior to all other rights. Brown v. Chadbourne, 31 Me. 9; Morgan v. King, 35 N. Y. 458; Moore v. Sanborne, 2 Mich. 526; Treat v. Lord, 42 Me. 562.

The question what is a reasonable use of a right depends on the subject matter and the attendant circumstances. Michigan Cent. R. Co. v. Coleman, 28 Mich. 440; Davis v. Winslow, 51 Me. 295; Underwood v. Waldron, 38 Mich. 229; Weise v. Smith, 3 Or. 445; Scrapps v. Rellly, 38 Mich. 27.

What constitutes a navigable stream.

One thing appears perfectly clear, that the common law of England on this subject is not the common law of America. Rules which reason and convenience may have dictated in reference to such streams as the Thames and the Avon, may be wholly inapplicable to the Mississippi, the Ohio and the Hudson. The timber trade alone, on such a river as the Hudson, running through immense primeval forests, would of itself create an exception. In granting the public lands of such a State, bounded on such a river, to private individuals, no Legislature, without express words, could be presumed to have intended to divest itself of the power of protecting so important a public interest. Lowber v. Wells, 13 How. Pr. 454.

None of the adjudications cover the precise question here involved. In Maine, where the right to float logs in such streams as are suitable is so important, the same general doctrine which was accepted and declared in Moore v. Sanborn (2 Mich. 519) has been repeatedly acted upon. Brown v. Chadbourne, 31 Me. 9; Treat v. Lord, 42 Me. 562. And see Veazie v. Dwinel, 50 Me. 484; Gerrish v. Brown, 51 Me. 256; Davis v. Winslow, 51 Me. 297.

The true rule is, that the public have a right of way in every stream which is capable, in its natural state and its ordinary volume of water, of transporting, in a condition fit for market, the product of the forests, or mines, or of the tillage of the soil upon its banks. It is not essential to the right, that the property to be transported should be carried in vessels, provided it can ordinarily be carried safely without such guidance. Nor is it necessary that the stream should be capable of being navigated against its current as well as in the direction of its current. If it is so far navigable or floatable as to be of public use in the transportation of property, the public claim to such use ought to be liberally supported. Nor is it essential to the easement that the capacity of the stream should be continuous, or that its ordinary state, at all seasons of the year, should be such as to make it navigable. If it is ordinarily subject to periodical fluctuations in the volume of its water, attributable to natural causes, and recurring as regularly as the seasons, and if its periods of high water and navigable capacity ordinarily continue a sufficient length of time to make it useful as a highway, it is subject to the public easement. Morgan v. King, 35 N. Y. 459. See also same case in the supreme court, —18 Barb. 284, and 30 Barb. 9; Shaw v. Crawford, 10 Johns. 236; Weise v. Smith, 3 Or. 445, 8 Am. Rep. 621.

No case goes further than these, and they carefully restrict the public easement within the bounds of a capability for use in the ordinary and natural condition of the watercourse. The possibility of occasional use during unusual and brief freshets certainly could not make a stream a pub-over a dam which has been erected for manufacturing purposes becomes necessary, the convenience of the mill-owners will be consulted so far as it reasonably may be without a violation of the public rights.

(December 2, 1890.)

BILL in equity to restrain defendant from maintaining a dam across the Connecticut River at Olcott Falls in Lebanon, without providing suitable sluiceways for the passage of logs floated by plaintiffs down the river. Case discharged.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Aldrich & Remick and Drew & Jordan, for complainants:

The Connecticut River is by nature a public highway.

Scott v. Wilson, 3 N. H. 821; Thompson v. Androskoggin River Imp. Co. 54 N. H. 548; Barnes v. Heath (unpublished op.); Gould, Waters, §§ 107-109; Angell, Highways, §§ 55, 56, 67-72.

The Connecticut River being a natural public highway, the individual or private rights along its banks are "held subject to the risks (and uses) incident to the exercise of the public right."

Thompson v. Androskoggin River Imp. Co. 54 N. H. 558; Barnes v. Heath (unpublished op.); Knox v. Chaloner, 42 Me. 150; Treat v. Lord, 42 Me. 552; Dwinel v. Veazie, 44 Me. 167; Parks v. Morse, 52 Me. 260; Lancey v. Clifford, 54 Me. 487; Veazie v. Dwinel, 50 Me. 479; Stoughton v. Baker, 4 Mass. 522; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 100; Com. v. Essex Co. 13 Gray, 248.

The owner of a mill-dam on such a river is bound to provide a suitable and reasonably convenient passageway for commerce; and if he fails to do so his dam becomes a nuisance, and may be abated by any member of the public having occasion to use the same.

Dwinel v. Veazie, Parks v. Morse and Lancey v. Clifford, supra; Wood, Nuisances, § 756, p. 858, also §§ 488, 484, 753, 757-762.

Courts of equity will interfere to restrain and prevent threatened public nuisances at the suit of a private person who may suffer a special injury thereby, as well as to abate those already existing.

lic highway. It is so held in Hubbard v. Bell, 54 Ill. 110, a case which unnecessarily criticises the Maine and Michigan cases as exceptional, though they may well stand with that upon its facts.

Nature is competent, it has been said, to make a navigable river without the aid of the Legislature (Martin v. Bliss, 5 Blackf. 35); and it is now fully established in this country, overruling the earlier decisions, that the public have a right of passage over all fresh-water streams which are by nature susceptible of general use, and that those rivers are public and navigable in law which are navigable in fact. Hale, De Jure Maris, chaps. 2, 8; *Williams v. By the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction courts may abate a nuisance, at the instance of a party who is a sufferer in a special or particular manner distinct from that suffered by him in common with the public at large; but this injury must be real and such that the legal remedy of damages would not be adequate. 3 Pom. The Supreme Court of New Hampshire has asserted its full equitable jurisdiction to restrain or abate nuisances in all cases where legal remedies are impracticable or inadequate.

Pom. Eq. § 308; Coe v. Winnipissee Lake C. & W. Mfg. Co. 37 N. H. 254; Webber v. Gage, 39 N. H. 182; Burnham v. Kempton, 44 N. H. 78; Eastman v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 47 N. H. 71; Bassett v. Salisbury Mfg. Co. 47 N. H. 426.

In such cases the right of trial by jury does not exist. Bellows v. Bellows, 58 N. H. 60.

The plaintiffs ask for an injunction against the defendants' maintaining a dam across the Connecticut River without providing suitable sluiceways for the reasonable passage of timber. Such an injunction would be mandatory in character, but has been repeatedly granted by courts of equity.

Pom. Eq. § 1359, note 2; Robinson v. Byron, 1 Bro. Ch. 588; High. Inj. 2d ed. §§ 792-804, note 2; Rankin v. Huskisson, 4 Sim. 13; Spencer v. London & B. R. Co. 8 Sim. 198; *Pennsylvania v. The construction of their charter claimed by the defendants would be contrary to the well-defined policy of New Hampshire, as expressed by repeated Acts of the Legislature. A construction abridging a public right will not be given to a legislative Act unless such intention is expressly and distinctly stated therein.

Hooksett v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 44 N. H. 106; Treat v. Lord, 42 Me. 552.

Mr. W. S. Ladd, with Mr. Jeremiah Smith, for defendants:

There was not at the time of the adoption of our Constitution, and is not now, any remedy by private suit in equity in a case like the present; the only remedy was, and is, by public proceeding on behalf of the State; in such public proceeding there was at the time of the adoption of the Constitution an unquestioned right of trial by jury; and the Legislature has 18 L. R. A.

not attempted to take away this right, and could not if it would.

The plaintiffs at the time of filing the bill could not have maintained an action at law.

Bowden v. Lewis, 18 R. I. 189, 43 Am. Rep. 21; Clark v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 70 Wis. 593.

At the time of commencing this suit, the plaintiffs not only had suffered no damage, but apprehended no damages save the loss of a public right which they were privileged to enjoy only in common with the rest of the public.

Rose v. Groves, 5 Man. & G. 613.

Undoubtedly a riparian owner has, like every other citizen, the right of navigating the river as one of the public. This, however, is not a right coming to him qua owner or occupier of any lands on the bank; nor is it a right which, per se, he enjoys in a manner different from any other member of the public.

Lyon v. Fishmongers Co. L. R. 1 App. Cas. 662.

These plaintiffs complain solely of injury to a public right, and the damage liable to be suffered by the plaintiffs differs only in degree, and not in kind, from that liable to be suffered by the rest of the community.

O'Brien v. Norwich & W. R. Co. 17 Conn. 372; Seeley v. Bishop, 19 Conn. 128; Harvard College v. Stearns, 15 Gray, 1; Brayton v. Fall River, 113 Mass. 218; Blackwell v. Old Colony R. Co. 122 Mass. 1; Houck v. Wachter, 84 Md. 265, 6 Am. Rep. 332; San José Ranch Co. v. Brooks, 74 Cal. 463; Clark v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 70 Wis. 593; *Chicago v. Union Bldg. The weight of New Hampshire authority is decidedly against the maintenance of a bill in equity to restrain or abate an alleged nuisance, until after the right has first been established in a suit at law (where there would, of course, be a trial by jury upon all questions of fact).

See Burnham v. Kempton, 44 N. H. 78; Eastman v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 47 N. H. 71; Perkins v. Foye, 60 N. H. 496; Parker v. Winnipissee Lake C. & W. Co. 67 U. S. 2 Black, 545, 17 L. ed. 383. Where an injunction is granted without a trial at law, it is usually upon the principle of preserving the property until a trial at law can be had.

The present case is not a case of purpresture, or invasion of the soil of the State. The bed of the Connecticut River at Lebanon and Norwich belongs to the riparian owners, and not to the State.

Gould, Waters, § 56, p. 118; Kimball v. Schoff, 40 N. H. 190.

It is clear that, before recent statutory changes in the law of procedure, this controversy could not have been constitutionally decided adversely to the defendants until after a jury trial. These enactments do not have the effect of depriving the defendants of the constitutional right of trial by jury which they previously had, such a result is beyond the power of the Legislature.

Powers v. Raymond, 137 Mass. 488. See also Merchants Nat. Bank of Newburyport v. Moulton, 3 New Eng. Rep. 784, 143 Mass. 545; North Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Snowden, 42 Pa. 488.

The grant of the right to build a dam necessarily implies the right to cause some obstruction to the passage of logs; but the grant must be regarded as subject to the implied limitation that the dam shall be so built as to create no obstructions except such as are reasonably necessary to the beneficial maintenance and use of the dam for manufacturing purposes. In determining this question of reasonable necessity, a jury is to take into account not only the requirements and convenience of floatation, but also the requirements and convenience of manufacturing.

See Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Fernald, 47 N. H. 444; Pearson v. Rolfe, 76 Me. 886.

The jury, in passing on the question of the reasonable sufficiency of the sluiceway, are not to proceed upon the theory that the public right of floatation is superior to the public right of manufacturing. The reasonableness of the sluiceway is to be determined, not solely in view of the interest and convenience of the log-owner, but in view, also, of the interest and convenience of the manufacturer.

See Rindge v. Sargent, 4 New Eng. Rep. 523, 64 N. H. 294; Foster v. Seareport S. & B. Co. 5 New Eng. Rep. 286, 79 Me. 508.

We may safely concede that the power conferred by the charter of the manufacturing company must be so exercised as not to injure the interests of others more than is reasonably necessary to accomplish the purpose for which the charter was granted. But this concession only shows that the harm likely to be caused by the dam was intended to be mitigated, so far as reasonably consistent with its erection and beneficial use, and not that the dam was to be so built as to present no material obstruction to navigation.

See Pound v. Turck, 95 U. S. 459, 24 L. ed. 525.

The Legislature may fairly be supposed to have taken into account the fact that the stream at the place in question, though in a certain sense navigable, is not capable of general or extended navigation.

Pearson v. Rolfe, 76 Me. 886.

The right of floating is not paramount to the use of water for machinery, and the rights of the public and those of the riparian owners are both to be enjoyed with proper regard to the existence and preservation of the other.

Gould, Waters, § 110; Middleton v. Flat River Boom Co. 27 Mich. 533; Ensworth v. Com. 52 Pa. 820.

Defendants are not under legal obligation to provide a public way for the passage of logs over their dam, better than would be afforded by the natural condition of the river unobstructed by their dam. A mill-owner is under 18 L. R. A.¶

no legal obligation to furnish any public passage for logs over his dam at a time when the river at such place, in its natural condition, does not contain water enough to be floatable if unobstructed by mills, although the river is generally of a floatable character.

Pearson v. Rolfe, 76 Me. 880.

Blodgett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the original bill the Lumber Company were sole plaintiffs. Their complaint is that they annually exercise the public right of floating logs down Connecticut River, and that the defendants have obstructed the way by a dam at Olcott Falls. The prayer is for a decree restraining the defendants from maintaining the dam without suitable sluiceways, for a provision in the decree determining the dimensions and character of the sluiceways, and for general relief. The defendants demurred on the ground that the alleged grievance is a public nuisance for the abatement of which a suit cannot be maintained by a private person. This objection has been avoided by an amendment joining the attorney-general as plaintiff, and the demurrer is overruled without considering the question whether the bill can be maintained by the Lumber Company. Dover v. Portsmouth Bridge, 17 N. H. 200, 215; Griffin v. Sanborn, 44 N. H. 246; Smith v. Putnam, 62 N. H. 369, 373; Milarky v. Foster, 6 Or. 378, and notes in 25 Am. Rep. 533; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge, 54 U. S. 13 How. 518, 561, 562, 564, 566, 567, 14 L. ed. 249, 267, 268, 269; Knickerbocker Ice Co. v. Shultz, 116 N. Y. 382; Steam-Boat Co. v. South Carolina R. Co. 30 S. C. 539; Gould, Waters, §§ 121-127, 547; Wood, Nuisances, §§ 645-701, 819.

If that question becomes material in the progress of the case, it will be examined when its decision is necessary. The mode of trial on a bill in equity for the abatement of a nuisance is not an open question. State v. Saunders, 66 N. H. —.

"The channel of a public navigable river is properly described as a public highway." Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 339, 373.

"A stream may be a public highway for floatage when it is capable, in its ordinary and natural stage in the seasons of high water, of valuable public use. . . . It is a public highway by nature, but one which is such only periodically, and while the natural condition permits a public use. . . . The public right is measured by the capacity of the stream for valuable public use in its natural condition." Thunder Bay River Boom Co. v. Speechly, 31 Mich. 336, 343-345; Guston v. Mace, 33 W. Va. 14; Koopman v. Blodgett, 70 Mich. 610, 14 West. Rep. 909; State v. Gilmanton, 14 N. H. 467, 479; Carter v. Thurston, 58 N. H. 104; Collins v. Howard, 65 N. H. 190; Gould, Waters, §§ 54, 86, 107-113; Angell, Highways, §§ 53-73.

The Connecticut River is a natural highway for floating logs. Thompson v. Androscegin River Imp. Co. 54 N. H. 545, 548, 549; Connecticut River Lumber Co. v. Columbia, 62 N. H. 286, 287.

At Olcott Falls the public has a right of passage for logs as free and convenient as would be afforded by the river in its natural condition, unless the highway has been wholly or par tially discontinued by law. The riparian proprietors, incorporated or unincorporated, in the exercise of their private rights, may change the natural condition of the stream so far as changes are possible without an infringement of the public right. The riparian title, including a right of altering the channel and using the water, does not include a right of total or partial discontinuance of the changeable way of which the capacity of the stream in its natural condition is the measure. "Any person owning the land upon both sides of such a river can maintain a ferry or bridge or dam for his own use, provided he does it so as not to interfere with the public easement, without any authority from the Legislature, and even in defiance of a legislative prohibition. In such case he would not be making a proper use of his own property. . . . What rights did the Legislature give the plaintiff by its Act of incorporation? It made it a corporation, and gave it the corporate right to build its bridge. For that purpose only a corporation was not needed, nor was legislative sanction needed. But, being authorized by the Legislature to build the bridge, it could not be complained of for any necessary interference with the public easement which was under legislative control; for that which is authorized by law cannot be a public nuisance. . . . The Legislature did not empower it to interfere with the stream except so far as it was necessary for the building and maintenance of its bridge." Chenango Bridge Co. v. Paige, 83 N. Y. 178, 185, 186; Groat v. Moak, 94 N. Y. 115, 128; Sewall's Falls Bridge v. Fisk, 23 N. H. 171, 177; Hooksett v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 44 N. H. 105, 110; Eastman v. Amoskeag Mfg. Co. 44 N. "The Statute gives a general authority to the sessions to lay out highways; but the Statute must have a reasonable construction. This authority, therefore, cannot be extended to the laying out of a highway over a navigable river, whether the water be fresh or salt, so that the river may be obstructed by a bridge. A navigable river is, of common right, a public highway; and a general authority to lay out a new highway must not be so extended as to give a power to obstruct an open highway already in the use of the public." Com. v. Coombs, 2 Mass. 489, 492; Arundel v. McCulloch, 10 Mass. 70; Com. v. Charlestown, 1 Pick. 180.

In Connecticut, under a general power to lay out highways, a road may be laid across navigable water where a suitable bridge will not be a serious obstruction to navigation. Groton v. Hurlburt, 22 Conn. 178, 186-189; Brown v. Preston, 38 Conn. 219.

Such cases are consistent with the rule that authority to lay out a new highway does not warrant an unnecessary obstruction of an old one. A toll-gate of a turnpike, unnecessarily obstructing a free road, is a public nuisance. Wales v. Stetson, 2 Mass. 143. A franchise to build a railroad between certain points does not include a right to build it unnecessarily on or along a street. Springfield v. Connecticut River R. Co. 4 Cush. 63; Comrs. on Inland Fisheries v. Holyoke Water P. Co. 104 Mass. 446, 449.

The charter of the Franklin Falls Company authorizes it to establish and carry on various manufactures "in the improvement of the water-power of the Winnipiseogee River." Laws 1868, chap. 2797. In State v. Franklin Falls Co., 49 N. H. 240, it was held that the defendants could not lawfully maintain a dam that would prevent the passage of migratory fish from the sea to the lake. Its right to carry on manufacturing business "in the improvement of the water-power" included a right to maintain such a dam and make such a diversion of the water from the natural channel as would not infringe any public right of way. Sometimes the water was "not more than sufficient to carry the machinery," and the company's works could not be enlarged to such an extent that no water would ordinarily run over the dam. But the requirements of their business were not held to be material. They could build a stairway for the ascent of fish, as they could build a sluiceway for the descent of logs. The necessity of building a dam and diverting the water to their wheels was not deemed a necessity of discontinuing the public right of a fish-way. The right of riparian owners to improve and use the power of the river, with or without a charter, was undisputed; but it was not suggested by the defendants that their charter discontinued the right of way or authorized its discontinuance; and such a construction not being claimed, the legal ground on which it must be rejected is not stated in the decision whether a river is a highway for fish, or for logs, or for both, a grant of the advantages of a corporate organization to persons engaged in the improvement and use of the water-power for manufacturing purposes does not show that a total or partial discontinuance of the way was intended by the Legislature. Com. v. Essex Co. 13 Gray, 289, 248; Commissioners on Inland Fisheries v. Holyoke Water P. Co. 104 Mass. 446, 450. It merely shows that the franchise asked by the grantees and given by the State is a corporate capacity to exercise common-law rights of riparian owners. A grant to these defendants of a right to do as an incorporated body what they could do as unincorporated partners was necessary, because "corporations are artificial persons, created for specific purposes, and invested with such, and only such, powers as are conferred by law. While natural persons may do with themselves and their property whatever is not forbidden, artificial persons cannot rightfully do anything that is not expressly or by necessary implication permitted by the law of their being." Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Lyon, 123 Pa. 140, 150, 2 L. R. A. 489; Case v. Kelly, 133 U. S. 21, 33 L. ed. 513.

An Act authorizing certain persons merely to form themselves into a corporation would be useless. Without an authority conferred by statute upon the Olcott Falls Company to do something, it could do nothing. Pierce v. Emery, 32 N. H. 484, 512. In addition to a mere Act of incorporation, a grant of power was indispensable to enable it, as a corporation, to engage in the improvement and manufacturing use of Olcott Falls. Without such a grant it would be restrained by injunction, at the suit of one of the members, from carrying on that business; and on quo warranto, brought by the State, its unanimous usurpation of corporate franchises would be suppressed. It is a corporation for a manufacturing purpose, and can purchase and hold a limited amount of real estate, improve the water-power, make and maintain on and across the river at the falls all such works as are necessary and proper to accomplish the object of its incorporation, and carry on such kinds of manufacturing business as it choose. Laws 1848, chap. 674; Laws 1881, chap. 183.

In the grant of power, without which it could not lawfully acquire or lawfully exercise the private riparian rights that are subject to the public easement, there is no incidental relinquishment or diminution of the easement. The language of such a grant would be the same if the river were not a highway. Of itself alone, it has no tendency to prove that the subject of highway discontinuance was in the mind of the Legislature. If the question of discontinuance is presented to that body and decided in the affirmative, there will naturally be some clear and positive evidence of the decision in the Statute. It cannot be assumed that an exercise of the discontinuing power is concealed, either accidentally or designedly, under an ordinary grant of corporate capacities, expressed in terms equally appropriate whether the river is or is not a highway. The Acts from which the defendants derive their powers contain no express discontinuance of the Connecticut easement, and no express grant of power to discontinue it, either wholly or partially. Their incidental power of discontinuance cannot be implied from anything less than necessity; and the case shows no ground for the implication of a discontinuance, or a grant of discontinuing power. In the method of finding the fact of legislative intention by weighing competent evidence, and not by applying technical rules (Boody v. Watson, 64 N. H. 162, 189), there is no occasion to resort to the authorities that employ a strict rule to confine business corporations to the privileges plainly given them in their charter. Under that rule the defendants claim that the public right has been affected by their Acts of incorporation could not be sustained. Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 36 U. S. 11 Pet. 420, 544-548, 9 L. ed. 773, 822-824; Jersey City Water Comrs. v. Hudson, 13 N. J. Eq. 420, 425; Selman v. Wolfe, 27 Tex. 68; Syracuse Water Co. v. Syracuse, 116 N. Y. 167, 169, 5 L. R. A. 546; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. 291-296.

Under authority given by statute, an owner of a lot situated on the margin of the tide-water of East River extended the dry land into the water. Before the extension a street had been laid out over the lot to the river. It was held that the filling of the river by the land-owner "carried with it a necessary and legal extension of the street over the new made land" to the edge of the water. The ground of decision was that the Legislature intended to confer a privilege on the owner of the land, but not to destroy the right of the public to reach the river through the street; that the Act should not "be so construed as to work a public mischief unless required by words of the most explicit and unequivocal import;" that the language of the Act did not necessarily or naturally import that the right of passage from the street to the river should be destroyed by filling up the river; that "in an Act designed chiefly, if not exclusively, to subserve individual interests, the words used must leave no doubt that the Legislature intended to annihilate or abridge an important public right, before a court should put such a construction upon it as would have that effect;" and that public rights are not to be destroyed by equivocal words or provisions. People v. Lumber, 5 Denio, 9, 15-17. Whether the extension of the street was rightly or wrongly implied, it illustrates the tendency of the authorities to employ the doctrine of necessary implication in the maintenance, rather than in the abridgment, of public rights. As the Statutes do not show a legislative assent to a total or partial discontinuance of the Connecticut highway, an assent implied from necessity, if it can be shown from extraneous evidence in some cases, must, to say the least, be satisfactorily proved; and, as the facts of a case of necessity are not alleged in pleading, there is no issue on which such evidence is admissible.

In the answer the defendants say that the "falls, when the river ran in its natural course there, were impassable in low stages of the water by logs; that the defendants' works, by ponding back the water, entirely cover and flow out a bad and rocky fall above, where otherwise logs would lodge upon and among the rocks, forming great jams, requiring great labor and expense to break, all which is saved to them in the way described;" that the defendants did, "at very large expense, construct in said dam, in the best place for the passage of logs, a sluiceway of ample and convenient size and construction, being eighteen feet wide and four inches deep at the top of the dam, and fitted the same with an apron of plank thoroughly covered with iron plates, so designed and located as to conduct logs safely into the deep-water channel below; and in the iron facing on the top of their dam, throughout its entire length, made holes for the insertion of iron pins to hold flashboards of any width desired, and at each side of said sluiceway, at the top of the dam, they inserted ring bolts for the attachment of booms to guide logs into said sluiceway; and so it is, by means of the appliances thus provided in the construction of their dam and sluiceway, all the water flowing in the river may at any time, with trifling labor and expense, be turned and compelled to pass through the sluiceway, whereby logs will be easily and conveniently floated over the dam and falls, and passed into the deep water below;" and "that the works of the defendants, in their present condition, greatly facilitate, rather than impede, the passage of logs over said falls, and diminish, rather than increase, the expense thereof." By these averments the defendants deny the necessity of constructing the dam in such a manner as to abridge the public right of log floatation. On this disclaimer it is assumed that the dam with a sluice (including an apron) of proper form, size, and location, and other suitable appliances for turning logs and the whole river through the sluice, would not injure, but would improve, the way for the use made of it by the Lumber Company in June of each year; and, as the benefit that might be derived from a manufacturing diversion and use of the water is no more a necessity of highway discontinuance in this case than it was in State v. Franklin Falls Co., there seems to be no occasion for serious controversy.

If the consent of the State that "highways may be laid out across any stream or body of water" (Gen. Laws, chap. 87, § 10) had been unqualified, it might have been claimed that it included authority to impair the right of navigation. For that reason, the Legislature added the prohibition: "But no road or bridge shall be so laid out if the reasonable and proper construction thereof may prevent the use of such waters for navigation for boats or rafts, or for running timber." The charters of the Concord, the Northern, and the Boston, Concord & Montreal Railroads, authorizing the erection of bridges across certain rivers, contain a proviso that the bridges shall be so constructed as not unnecessarily to impede navigation. Act of June 27, 1835, § 15; Laws 1844, chap. 190, § 2, 191, § 2. Such provisos may be useful for the purpose of avoiding the question of interpretation. They would be serious defects if they introduced the erroneous construction that, without them, unnecessary obstruction of highways would be authorized by the general law, and by ordinary acts of incorporation.

The Act of 1807, incorporating the White River Falls Company, contains a proviso that nothing in that Act shall authorize the company "to erect any dam . . . so as to prevent the free passage of lumber down Connecticut River as heretofore used and enjoyed." It is alleged in the bill that the defendants derive their powers from that Act, and from the Acts of 1848 and 1881. In their answer the defendants say they constructed their works in the exercise of the powers granted by the Acts of 1848 and 1881, but they do not deny or explain the fact, well alleged in the bill, that they derive their corporate powers from the Act of 1807, as well as the Acts of 1848 and 1881. "All facts well alleged in the bill, and not denied or explained in the answer, will be held to be admitted." Chancery Rule 8, 56 N. H. 605.

There was a special reason for reserving the right of free passage in the Act of 1807. That Act incorporated a canal company, and gave them power to improve the navigation at the falls by a locked canal, and to take toll for the use of the artificial way. But, for the benefit of all who should prefer a free passage in the old way to the use of a canal on payment of toll, the right of free passage in the old way is reserved. It is recited in the preamble that the "erecting locks and cutting canals on White River Falls" (now called "Olcott Falls") "and Connecticut River, so that the same shall be navigable for boats for the transportation of lumber, goods, wares, and merchandise, would be of great public utility," and that "Mills Olcott, of Hanover, has petitioned the general court for the exclusive privilege of locking the same." Thereupon it is "enacted that the said Mills Olcott and his associates, their heirs and assigns forever, be invested with the exclusive privilege of cutting canals and locking said falls, and rendering said Connecticut River navigable for boats and lumber, from the head of said falls at the upper bar, so called, to the foot of the falls, at the lower bar of the same, commonly called 'Phelps Bar.'" It was apparently feared that under their exclusive powers the canal company would claim a right to levy toll upon all lumber passing down the river at that point, and to make such alterations in the channel as would compel lumbermen to resort to the canal for the use of which the company is entitled to a toll. The avoidance of all controversy on this subject is the apparent purpose of the reservation of the public right to a free passage of lumber in the old way. From the abundant caution exercised in the insertion of a proviso to prevent all possible contention between the canal company and the lumberman on the question of highway discontinuance, it does not follow that the old highway for logs would have been discontinued if it had not been expressly reserved. However that may be, the reservation in the charter of the canal company has no tendency to show that the subsequent grants of corporate power for manufacturing purposes are a total or practical discontinuance of the old way. Under those grants, which did not authorize the grantees to exact toll, there was no reason to anticipate a claim of toll, and therefore no occasion for such a reservation of the right of free passage as was made in the grant of canal powers. The Act of 1848, chap. 674, § 3, contains the proviso "that this grant shall not be held or construed to impair any rights, powers, and privileges heretofore granted by the Legislature of this State within the limits aforesaid." The same section shows that the limits are the "falls, from the head thereof at the upper bar to the foot of the same at the Phelps bar, so called." The fourth section of the Act is: "Said corporation is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase, hold, and enjoy all the corporate and other rights, powers, and privileges heretofore granted and now enjoyed within the limits of this grant, subject to all the duties and liabilities now legally binding in said corporate rights, powers, and privileges." Upon the proviso, saving the powers granted by the charter of 1807; the grant of authority to the defendants to purchase, hold, and enjoy those powers, subject to all the duties and liabilities by which they continued to be restricted in 1848; and the admission of the defendants, in pleading, that their powers are derived from the Act of 1807 as well as the Acts of 1848 and 1881,—the conclusion seems to be inevitable that the defendants are holders of corporate powers granted by the charter of 1807, and that this power is subject to the reservation of the public right of free passage of lumber down the river as usually enjoyed before 1807. In the absence of evidence, there was no presumption of law or fact that the natural highway was altered before 1807; and until evidence of a change is introduced the continuance of the natural state of things may be inferred.

The defendants contend that the phrase, "subject to all the duties and liabilities now legally binding on said corporate rights, powers, and privileges," does not include the inability to "erect any dam . . . so as to prevent the free passage of lumber down Connecticut River as heretofore used and enjoyed."

They argue that "all the duties and liabilities" thus retained and perpetuated are obligations of an affirmative nature,—to permit logs to pass through the canal on payment of toll, to pay debts, and the like,—are not restrictions of authority. But it would be a violent construction to draw a line between the affirmative and the negative duties and liabilities of the canal company, and hold that by "all the duties and liabilities now legally binding on said corporate rights, powers, and privileges" only those of an affirmative nature were designated. It is not probable that the Legislature employed that inferential distinction as an implied release of the canal company's grantee from one of that company's incapacities, and an implied grant of power to discontinue the highway. Whatever else the proviso in the Act of 1848 may mean, it must be held to express the legislative will that the defendants, if they bought the powers of the canal company, would hold them subject to the proviso of 1807, and that, as a canal company, they should erect no dam so as "to prevent the free passage of lumber down the Connecticut River as . . . used and enjoyed" before the grant of the canal company's charter. The words "subject to all the duties and liabilities now legally binding on said corporate rights, powers, and privileges" do not specially refer to that company's duty of allowing a free passage of lumber, but evince a general resolve to annul none of the limitations of their powers; and among those limitations is the public right of free passage of lumber down the river. By purchasing the old company's franchises, the new company acquired no authority to erect a dam that would infringe that right. This lack of authority is among the incapacities unnecessarily re-enacted by the fourth section of the charter of 1848. The defendants could not obtain, by purchase from the canal company, a power of highway discontinuance that had not been granted to that company. As a canal company, the defendants can build a dam that will turn the whole stream into a canal for the use of which they are entitled to toll; but, if a lumberman chooses a free logway which they choose not to give him in the canal, he is entitled to one over, through, or around the dam, as good as he would have in the old undammed channel at the time he is ready to use it. As a manufacturing company, the defendants can also turn the river to their wheels through a flume. How much of it shall run through the canal for a transportation purpose, how much through the flume for a manufacturing purpose, and how much over the dam, is for them to decide, with this qualification: their control is subject to any public right of way that the Legislature have not relinquished.

On the question whether any such right has been released by grants of manufacturing powers, the intention of the Legislature can be seen in a supposed case in which the defendants use a canal as a canal company, and a flume as a manufacturing company. At the lower end of the flume they have a saw-mill in which one man is employed. In June a lumberman arrives at the falls with a drive. There is water enough to carry his logs over the falls in the natural channel if there was no dam there. All the water, turned into the canal, would afford a more convenient passage. All the water, turned into the flume, would work the saw-mill. The whole of it is necessary for either of the three purposes to which it may be applied. The flume gate is open, and the mill in operation. There is no water in the canal, and none running over the dam. The lumberman demands a passage through the canal, and tenders the toll. His demand must be complied with. The canal, like a turnpike or a railroad, is a highway. As a canal company, the defendants have not been relieved from the highway duties and liabilities of their predecessors. The canal gate must be opened, and the flume gate must be shut, although for a time the mill will be stopped, and its operator thrown out of employment. As soon as the defendants have performed this canal duty, another lumberman arrives, and demands a passage for his logs without payment of toll. Whether the defendants furnish it in the canal, or through a sluice over the dam, the flume gate remains shut, and the mill and its operator remain idle, while the highway demand of the second lumberman is complied with. Whether the number of his logs is ten or ten million; whether their passage stops their mill an hour or a month; and whether the number of mill operators is one or one thousand,—the lumberman is entitled to a free way as good as he would have if no dam had been built, and no water had been diverted from the ancient channel. There is nothing in the Statute to indicate an intention that the public right shall be restricted to the passage of a fixed number or a reasonable number of logs, or shall depend upon the extent of the defendants' manufacturing industry and the number of persons engaged therein. If the Legislature had meant the public right might be indefinitely impaired, as it would be if a judicial tribunal were authorized to decide each case upon the comparative importance of the logging business of the lumbermen and the manufacturing business of the defendants, it is not probable that they would have been silent on that subject. The reduction of the highway from one measured by the power of the undiverted stream to carry logs over the unobstructed falls to one measured in each particular case, or in this case, by an appraisal of the logging and manufacturing interests, is a piece of legislation that cannot be inferred from the fact that the statutes contain no allusion to so extraordinary an alteration.

On the question whether a wharf in the port of Newcastle is a nuisance, evidence is not admissible to show that the public inconvenience caused by its obstruction of the Tyne is balanced by the public benefit derived from the delivery of coal in the London market in a better condition and at a reduced price in consequence of the shipping facilities afforded by the wharf. The contrary doctrine maintained by a majority of the court in King v. Russell, 6 Barn. & C. 566, 569, 570, 590, 591, 593, 594, 597, 598, and by a minority in Pennycuik v. Wheeling & B. Bridge, 54 U. S. 13 How. 518, 591, 605, 14 L. ed. 249-280, 286, has not prevailed. The true view was presented by counsel in Rex v. Ward, 4 Ad. & El. 384, 394: "Nor is the principle a just one that a nuisance in one place may be compensated by any degree of benefit conferred in another; as if a gasometer created a nuisance in Southwark, and it was answered that the gas-lights connected with it were beneficial to a street in London. No comparison can be instituted between accommodation to one set of persons and loss of rights to another." The necessity of slaughter-houses in this country does not legalize the diffusion of an intolerable stench from a structure of that kind in the center of Manchester. The violation of a public right enjoyed by a portion of the community is not justified by offsetting an advantage accruing to others. The State's abandonment of the whole or a part of the Connecticut easement, in consideration of the receipt of a public benefit of equal or greater value, is an exchange which the riparian owners cannot make without the State's consent. Rez v. Ward, 4 Ad. & El. 384; Jolliffe v. Wallasey Local Board, L. R. 9 C. P. 62, 88; Atty-Gen. v. Terry, 29 L. T. N. S. 716, on appeal, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 423, 432; Pennsylvania v. Wheeling & B. Bridge, 54 U. S. 13 How. 518, 577, 14 L. ed. 249, 274; Gould, Waters, § 94; Angell, Tide-Waters, 203-223; Angell, Highways, §§ 233, 235.

A bridge across a navigable river may be a more important highway than the river, and "it is for the municipal power . . . to decide which shall be preferred, and how far either shall be made subservient to the other." Gilman v. Philadelphia, 70 U. S. 8 Wall. 718, 729, 18 L. ed. 96, 99; Re Clinton Bridge, 77 U. S. 10 Wall. 454, 19 L. ed. 969; Miller v. New York, 109 U. S. 385, 394-398, 27 L. ed. 971, 974-976.

"The Legislature alone could determine the question of comparative public convenience, and either refuse to lay out a highway which would impede navigation, or grant it upon terms, conditions, and reservations, as the public interests might in their judgment require for the protection of the navigation." Charlestown v. Middlesex County Comrs. 3 Met. 202, 206; Com. v. Essex Co. 13 Gray, 239, 247; Com. v. Charlestown, 1 Pick. 180, 185, 187.

By an exercise of legislative power, authority can be given to wholly or partly discontinue a public way on land or water. The Connecticut easement is public property that can be abandoned by due action of the government. But no power has been conferred on the defendants or the court to exchange any part of it for public benefits derivable from the defendants' manufacturing enterprise.

The forests formerly owned by the State were held by the body politic in trust, in a certain sense, for the common benefit of the people. When the State sold them, the proceeds, like money raised by taxation, went into the vendor's treasury for public, not for private, use. When the title was in the State, it was not held for the several benefit of everybody who desired the timber for the construction of houses or ships. The public right of navigation in navigable water, salt or fresh, is held by the State in a different trust. It is a right that all may exercise for private profit. The State, as trustee, holds the legal title. The State, and the people, as individuals, have the use. The object of the trust is evidence tending to show that the common right of navigation is not unnecessarily extinguished by a mere conveyance of land, or a mere creation of an imaginary being called a corporation. "The dominion and property in navigable waters" is "held by the king as a public trust." "When the Revolution took place, the people of each State became themselves sovereign, and in that character hold the absolute right to all their navigable waters, and the soil under them, for their own common use." Martin v. Waddell, 41 U. S. 16 Pet. 367, 401, 410, 10 L. ed. 997. "By the principles of the common law, the title to navigable waters and the soil beneath is vested in the crown in trust for the public. . . . And by the charters under which these colonies were planted there was vested in the grantees not only the crown's title to the lands granted, but its rights and jurisdiction in and over the navigable waters and seashores, to be held, as by the crown, in trust for the public." Clement v. Burns, 43 N. H. 609, 616, 619. "By the common law, the king was held to be the owner and proprietor of the soil under the sea, its shores, and all tide-waters, and as such could grant the right of property therein to a subject, though this was not usually done without the previous execution and return of a writ ad quod damnum, to ascertain whether such grant would cause any injury to any public right. But it was further held at common law that, beyond a right of property, the king's prerogative extended to the dominion and control of the shores of the sea, as a power held in trust for the security and protection of the public rights in the navigation and fisheries; that these were among the regalia or incidents of sovereignty, which could not be alienated by royal grant alone. . . . Supposing, then, that the Commonwealth does hold all the power which exists anywhere to regulate and dispose of the seashores and tide-waters, and all lands under them, and all public rights connected with them, . . . it must be regarded as held in trust for the best interest of the public, for commerce and navigation, and for all the legitimate and appropriate uses to which it may be made subservient. . . . Two distinct rights are regarded, viz.: (1) The jus privatum, or right of property in the soil, which the king may grant, and which may be held by a subject, and the grant of which will confer on the grantee such privileges and benefits as can be enjoyed therein subject to the jus publicum. (2) The jus publicum, the royal prerogative, by which the king holds such shores and navigable rivers for the common use and benefit. This royal right, or jus publicum, is held by the crown in trust for such common use and benefit, and cannot be transferred to a subject, or alienated, limited, or restrained, by mere royal grant, without an Act of Parliament. The king's grant, therefore, although it may vest the right of soil in a subject, will not justify the grantee in erecting such permanent structures thereon as to disturb the common rights of navigation; and such obstruction, notwithstanding such grant, is held to be a public or private nuisance, as the case may be." Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 58, 82, 83, 90. "The king takes this right of soil in trust for the public, so far as fishing is concerned; and, although the king may grant away this right of soil to another, yet his grantee will take it subject to the same trust; and by such grant, however comprehensive in its terms, the public . . . cannot be deprived of their common rights." Weston v. Sampson, 8 Cush. 347, 352; Dunham v. Lamphere, 3 Gray, 268, 271; Moore v. Sanford, 151 Mass. 285, 7 L. R. A. 151; Free Fishers & D. v. Gann, 11 C. B. N. S. 387, 417; Angell, Tide-Waters, 2d ed. 22-25, 27, 64; Gould, Waters, §§ 17, 18, 20, 21.

"The right of soil . . . must in all cases be considered as subject to the public right of passage, . . . and any grantee of the crown must of course take subject to such right." Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Q. B. 389, 374.

A legal reason for the king's inability to surrender navigation is the establishment of the trust by usage and universal understanding for the maintenance of the common right. For the same reason, the right is not destroyed by the State's conveyance of the basin or bed in which the navigable waters rest, or through which they flow. No federal question being raised, this case is to be determined by the local law which regards the people and the State as holding the beneficial interest in an easement, the legal title of which is vested in the State as trustee. Acting as a body politic and trustee, the beneficiaries, by their legislative agents, can authorize an extinguishment of the trust and an abandonment of the trust estate. Wales v. Stetson, 2 Mass. 148, 146; Com. v. Charlestown, 1 Pick. 180, 185. But there is a natural presumption that, if the Legislature intend to do this, their purpose will be distinctly expressed, as in the provisions for the discontinuance of highways, and the assessment of damages therefor. Gen. Laws, chap. 71. "An intention to discontinue such a highway [as the Androscoggin] cannot be inferred from a public grant of the land under and around it,—a mere alienation of the ownership of the soil by an ordinary form of conveyance. A sale by the State of all its ungranted land could not be construed as a relinquishment and abolition of the public rights of navigation in Piscataqua River or Lake Winnipiseogee." Thompson v. Androscoggin River Imp. Co. 54 N. H. 545, 548. Such a sale was authorized by chapter 42, Laws 1867. When the soil under the Connecticut at Olcott Falls passed from the king or the State to the first grantees (under whom the defendants claim), it did not cease to be subject to the easement. An express reservation of the public trust and common use was unnecessary. And the nature of the trust which would have made that reservation superfluous in a state grant of the land to the defendants had the same effect in grants of corporate capacities deemed appropriate for other purposes than the total or partial discontinuance of the highway. Like the riparian rights comprised in the land title, the franchise of their artificial body to exercise those rights is subject to the easement held in trust for common use.

The express refusal of the Legislature to allow the defendants, as a canal company, to extinguish the old free way, if they furnished a new and better one, through a canal subject to tolls, has no tendency to show that the Legislature intended, for the sake of the most insignificant mill, to authorize them to stop the old way without providing a new one. If they can stop the passage of logs a single day in the dry season because they need all the water on that day for an up and down saw, they can discontinue the old way entirely by building and operating mills large enough to require all the water every day. They do not claim a power of total and absolute discontinuance; and in the statutes on which they rely there is no mention of any discontinuance, total or partial, permanent or temporary, to be accomplished by a manufacturing diversion of the water. There is no expression of a legislative intent to introduce such an uncertainty and such a prolific source of litigation as a corporate power of discontinuing the highway to some extent by turning a reasonable amount of the water from the natural channel for manufacturing purposes. The Acts of 1848 and 1881 enable the defendants to act as a corporate body in the exercise of riparian rights that existed before those Acts were passed, and do not curtail the measure of the public right of floatation which the common law finds in the natural capacity of the stream. If a temporary interruption is unavoidable in the erection or repair of a dam, the right of incorporated or unincorporated riparian owners to bar the way for that purpose without such a license from the State as is given by municipal governments for the occupation of streets during the erection or repair of buildings is a question that need not now be considered. The general rights of the riparian owners and the public may be subject to various qualifications. So far as this suit is concerned, the public right of way is not impaired by the Acts of 1807, 1848, and 1881. It is a right to a way of which the floating capacities of the undiverted river, in its natural channel, is the measure. The defendants' right is to use the river and its bed without an invasion of the public easement. Both rights are established by law. Neither of them can be altered by the trial and determination of any issue of fact. The only question of fact is as to the manner in which the public and the defendants can enjoy their several titles, and exercise their indisputable rights. The prayer of the bill is for a necessary regulation of the common use of the river for commercial and manufacturing purposes by a specific decree that cannot be rendered in a suit at law.

When the defendants were preparing to build the dam, the question necessarily arose by what sluice and what appliances they could avoid an infringement of the public right, and this question they were not compelled to decide at their peril. On their amicable bill, in which the attorney-general, as the representative of the State, would be defendant (Samson v. Smith, 8 Sim. 272; Tasker v. Lord, 64 N. H. 279, 283), and of which notice would be given to persons specially interested, the defendants could have obtained a provisional decree of regulation operating like a partition, marking the boundary line between the public and the private right, and enabling them to construct their works in a manner authorized by law. The proceeding would have been in the nature of an ad quod damnum. King v. Montague, 4 Barn. & C. 598; King v. Russell, 6 Barn. & C. 566, 588, 600; Nichols v. Boston, 98 Mass. 39, 41; Gould, Waters, §§ 21, 43. The decree, virtually laying out a logway over the projected dam would have afforded adequate protection against suits at law for damages, and efforts to abate an alleged nuisance by chancery suits, criminal prosecutions, and force without legal process. If it were found by experiment after the completion of the dam that either or both of the water-rights required an alteration, justice would be done on application of either party. An unalterable adjudication would not be made in a matter in which changes might be rendered necessary by results and circumstances that could not be foreseen and provided for. Either party might be plaintiff, and either party might be defendant. And, if this bill is necessary for a regulation of the manner of exercising the common rights by constituting and using a sluice and other appliances, it is not barred by the defendants' erection of a dam. "Courts of equity have jurisdiction of that class of cases where there is an admitted common right among several owners of the same privilege to regulate the common use, to determine the extent of their respective rights, and the proper mode of exercising and enjoying them, as tending to prevent litigation, and as affording a more complete and perfect remedy than could be obtained at law, and as furnishing, in fact, the only adequate means of ascertaining and determining the respective rights of the parties." Burnham v. Kempton, 44 N. H. 78, 100; Ranlet v. Cook, 44 N. H. 513-515; Bean v. Coleman, 44 N. H. 589, 542; Larson v. Menasha Wooden-Ware Co. 59 Wis. 398; Gould, Waters, § 540, and cases there cited. The ground of equity jurisdiction in many other cases is the want of an adequate process at law for finding lost boundaries (Story, Eq. Jur. chap. 11), and locating private ways. In Gardner v. Webster, 64 N. H. 520, 6 New Eng. Rep. 894, the defendant had conveyed land, reserving a right of way across to "the point so-called." In the opinion, the court says: "The locations and limits of the reserved ways are not specified. . . . The defendant is entitled to a reasonable, convenient, and suitable way, across the land conveyed, to the point. . . . The defendant's right of way through the plaintiff's pasture does not authorize him to pass over all parts of the pasture at his pleasure. Its route through that lot is determined, not by the sole interest of either of the parties, but by the reasonable convenience of both. If its location were contested, the controversy might not be settled by the negative result of many actions at law. Both parties, or either of them, might need a decree in equity that would fix the route affirmatively and specifically."

In the present case, on the question of proper form, dimensions, and place of a sluice, the jurisdiction of equity is as plain as a partition of water-power between mill-owners, the ascertainment of lost boundaries, or the laying out of a private way. At the trial term, the court can cause the logway to be located and defined by a jury, and put upon them the duty of drawing a report containing a specification for the construction of a dam and sluice. But it has not been shown that the law of any county requires such work to be done by twelve unanimous persons. If a judicial location of a logway over a dam is necessary, the convenience of the defendants will be consulted so far as it reasonably may be without a violation of the public right to a way as good as the stream would furnish in its natural condition, and the location will be alterable, at any future time, on application of either party. No location will be made unless a necessity for it is shown. It would seem that this question of necessity will be best tried and decided upon the experiments annually made at the falls. How long the bill should be retained for a satisfactory settlement of this point is a matter to be considered at the trial term. As either party can obtain equitable relief in vacation without this suit, it is possible that the case will be properly disposed of at the next trial term, or after another annual experiment, by dismissing the bill without costs and without prejudice except so far as equity may require a decree for the adjustment of expenses that have been incurred by either party under interlocutory orders.

If a logway is laid out in this suit, the public will have a right to a reasonable use of it. A controversy as to what would be a reasonable use of it, or of the stream in its natural condition, will not be a dispute about the public right in any sense that will require the right to be settled by the trial of a question of fact before the bill can be maintained for the laying out. As a fee-simple in land is, for many purposes, nothing more than a right of exclusive possession and reasonable use (Bassett v. Salisbury Mfg. Co. 48 N. H. 569, 577; Thompson v. Androscoggin River Imp. Co. 54 N. H. 545, 551, 552, 555; Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, 84, 87); so an ordinary public or private right of way is a right of using land or water or both as a way, reasonably and with due care (Sewall's Falls Bridge v. Fisk, 28 N. H. 171; George v. Fisk, 32 N. H. 32; Graves v. Shattuck, 35 N. H. 257; Thompson v. Androscoggin River Imp. Co. 54 N. H. 545, 555, 58 N. H. 108; Hall v. Brown, 54 N. H. 493, 495; Carter v. Thurston, 58 N. H. 104, 107; Varney v. Manchester, 58 N. H. 430; Collins v. Howard, 65 N. H. 190; Gould, Waters, §§ 95, 96, 110). The entire natural capacity of the river for floatation is public property. The lumbermen, as travelers on the highway, are entitled to a reasonable and careful use of the estate. Reasonableness of use and care, attached as a limitation to the ownership and enjoyment of corporeal and incorporeal property, does not permit the lumberman to injure the defendants' works by negligence or an unreasonable use of the entire natural floating power of the river, nor allow the defendants to deprive the lumbermen of the reasonable use of any part of the power. Both parties are bounded by the line established between the incorporeal rights of the public and the other rights of which the defendants' title is composed. There is no question of right or title, in the sense in which these words are used, when it is said that the legal right must be established at law before it is specially enforced in equity. If it is necessary to lay out the undeniable public way over the dam, one question may be how narrow the sluice should be, at different times, to secure a sufficient depth of water. The defendants are apparently as much interested as the lumber company in an economical solution of such questions. In cases like this and Gardner v. Webster, the owner of the servient tenement may sometimes be more relieved than the other party by a laying out of the easement. An equitable power employed in the measurement, location, and adjustment of legal rights before an attempt is made to exercise them is often more useful than any remedial course that can be taken after controversy has arisen on this alleged violation. In this case, the rights of all parties being known, a regulating process may not be needed.

EQUITABLE LIFE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE CO.

(.....Ga.....)

"If both parties engage willingly in a personal encounter, it is a mutual combat or fight, and death resulting therefrom is not included in a policy of accident insurance which

ERROR to the Superior Court for Fulton County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

NOTE.—Death resulting from a violation of law avoids an insurance policy.

A difficult question arises in determining what is the test of death in the violation of law. Obviously the circumstances of any given case are so different in detail from those of any other case that it is impracticable to lay down other than a general rule; and perhaps no better rule can be stated than that the act in violation of law, and the act causing death, must be part of "the same continuous transaction." And it is not clear that an essentially different rule need be applied where the exception is expressed as "in consequence of the violation of law;" though an exception in the last-mentioned form would clearly admit of greater remoteness in time and distance. Cooke, Life Ins. § 48.

The breach of law must not only be proximate as a cause of the death, it must be adequate also. If it be inadequate to produce the result, it is not the cause. 3 Kent, Com. 802; Arn. Ins. 764; Williams v. Suffolk Ins. Co. 3 Sumn. 276; New York L. Ins. Co. v. Graham, 2 Duv. 506; Livie v. Janson, 12 East, 648; Ionides v. Universal M. Ins. Co. 14 C. B. N. S. 259.

A known violation of a positive law avoids the policy if the natural and reasonable consequences of the violation are to increase the risk; a "violation of law," whether the law is a civil or a criminal one, does not avoid the policy, if the natural and reasonable consequences of the act does not increase the risk. The cases all agree that the wrongful act must have been the proximate cause of the death. The loss of life must be connected with the crime as its consequence. By reason of the guilty act the death must have occurred. Whether the "violation of law" was the proximate cause of death and whether it was an act increasing the risk, must be determined from the facts. There must be some causative connection between the act which constitutes the "violation of law" and the death of the assured. So where the assured robbed the state treasurer and while leaving the building was killed by a policeman, the court held that the words meant death in the actual violation of law, and that as the act had been completed, and the death occurred afterwards, there was no forfeiture. Griffin v. Western Mut. Ben. Asso. 20 Neb. 620; Bacon, Ben. Soc. & L. Ins. § 339; Bradley v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 45 N. Y. 422, 3 Lans. 341; Murray v. New York L. Ins. Co. 98 N. Y. 614; Traveler's Ins. Co. v. Seaver, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 531, 22 L. ed. 155.

The provision excluding liability for injury received while committing an unlawful act refers to such injuries as may happen as the natural consequence of the act,—as its probable and to be anticipated consequences; and the reference to injury received "in consequence of any unlawful act" is to those injuries which flow naturally from the act committed, as its effect or resulting consequence. Attempts to murder, in which lawful resistance may occasion death; attempts to injure or rob the wife or child or parent of another, in which injury might be expected from defense of that other; engaging in a horse-race where horse-racing is unlawful, and where the injury results during the race, or in the efforts to stop one of the horses in its progress; and the like,—are acts illustrating what is meant by "injuries received while insured was engaged in or in consequence of an unlawful act." The law is properly and well settled that such provision does not extend to exempt the insurer from liability because of the infraction by the insured of the law when the act has no connection with the injury, or when the act is in violation of some obligation of morality or rule of policy, not recognized or adopted as law. It has been held, too, that the unlawful act committed must be criminal, and not a mere violation of a civil right or infraction of a law not criminal. Adams v. Cowles, 14 West. Rep. 779, 95 Mo. 506; Cluff v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 13 Allen, 308; Bradley v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 45 N. Y. 422.

The contrary has been held, so far as it relates to the violation of a positive rule of civil law which proximately leads to the injury, when it is such an act as increased the risk and naturally led to the death. Bloom v. Franklin L. Ins. Co. 97 Ind. 478; Accident Ins. Co. of N. A. v. Bennett, (Tenn.) June 6, 1891.

A policy of insurance is to be construed most liberally in favor of the assured. Palmer v. Warren Ins. Co. 1 Story, 360; Yeaston v. Fry, 9 U. S. 5 Cranch, 335, 3 L. ed. 117; Bradley v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 45 N. Y. 422.

And an exception in a policy is to be taken strongest against the assurer. 1 Duer, Ins. 161; Huidekoper v. Douglass, 7 U. S. 3 Cranch, 1, 2 L. ed. 347; Breasted v. Farmers L. & T. Co. 8 N. Y. 305; Hoffman v. Aetna F. Ins. Co. 32 N. Y. 405. See note to Blackstone v. Standard L. & A. Ins. Co. (Mich.) 3 L. R. A. 486.

Messrs. J. D. Cunningham, J. A. Austin and Broyles & Sons for plaintiff in error.
Messrs. Candler & Thomson for defendant in error.

Bleckley, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The policy covered bodily injuries inflicted by external, violent, and accidental means. It excepted, however, various classes of accidental injuries which might be embraced in these general terms,—among them, those caused by dueling, fighting, wrestling, etc., and those happening in consequence of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger, hazard, or perilous adventure, or while engaged in, or in consequence of, any unlawful act, and all injuries, the result of design, either on the part of the claimant or any other person. It may be conceded that the homicide was accidental, within the meaning of the policy, as such policies have generally been construed by the courts. Ripley v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 2 Bigelow, Ins. Cas. 788; Hutchcraft v. Traveler's Ins. Co. 87 Ky. 800; Phelan v. Traveler's Ins. Co. 38 Mo. App. 640; Richards v. Traveler's Ins. Co. 89 Cal. 170; Supreme Council O. of C. F. v. Garrigues, 104 Ind. 183, 1 West. Rep. 861; notes to Paul v. Traveler's Ins. Co. (N. Y.) 8 Am. St. Rep. 768; Bliss, Ins. §§ 396, 397; 5 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 2140 et seq.; 1 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 87 et seq.; 7 Am. Law Rev. 585; same article, 8 Alb. L. J. 85.

It may be conceded also that, though the killing was manifestly willful on the part of the slayer, it was open to question whether it was the result of design,—that is, of rational design,—inasmuch as there was some evidence tending to show that the slayer might have been insane. It may likewise be conceded that, had the case turned alone on the question whether at the time the insured was shot he was engaged in an unlawful act, there was some evidence for consideration by the jury. The evidence as a whole might warrant a negative finding on this point, according to some of the authorities, though not so, perhaps, according to the spirit of others. Cluff v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 18 Allen, 808; Bradley v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 45 N. Y. 422; Harper v. Phoenix Ins. Co. 19 Mo. 506; Traveler's Ins. Co. v. Seaver, 86 U. S. 19 Wall. 532, 22 L. ed. 155; Bloom v. Franklin L. Ins. Co. 97 Ind. 478.

But, if the view we entertain of the law is correct, the matter on which after close study there could be no two opinions, no reasonable doubt in impartial and intelligent minds, is that the injury which resulted in death was caused by fighting. Shooting caused the injury, and fighting caused the shooting. The cause of the cause was the real cause of the event. Fighting may cause death by causing a contemporaneous act which causes death. In such case, the first causal agency is not too remote, though the event be related to it only in the second degree of lineal descent. It is not every fight, however, in or from which a mortal injury might be received by the insured, which could be regarded as the cause of the injury or of death resulting therefrom. A faultless and unwilling conflict by the insured —one which he neither provoked nor invited, one which he did not accept when formally or informally tendered, one in which he was forced to engage for self-defense alone, and from which he withdrew, or endeavored in good faith to withdraw, when his defense was accomplished—ought not to, and would not, be treated as a causative fight on his part, within the meaning and intent of the policy, but would be regarded as right and proper resistance to aggressive or offensive violence. To protect his life from destruction or his person from injury might be as much a matter of duty to the insurance company as of interest to himself. Means of resistance which it would be reasonable for him to employ for his own safety, he could not be excused for neglecting, if an efficient use of them were shown to be within his power. It would be no objection to their use that they involved "fighting back" in order to repel the violence of an assailant. The stipulation against liability for injuries caused by fighting refers to voluntary fighting by the insured, or involuntary fighting brought on wholly or partially by his fault or temerity—fighting for which he is partly responsible, either as a volunteer or as a rash speaker or wrong-doer. It could not be the purpose of the stipulation to cut off the right of self-defense by the use of force,—the right to repel violence with violence of like nature. The exercise of this right might be mutually beneficial to both of the contracting parties, and that either of them had any purpose to restrict a fair and reasonable exercise of it is in the highest degree improbable.

In order to attribute to the insured anything caused by the fight, he must have some voluntary agency in causing the fight itself. If he had such agency, if by improper speech or voluntary conduct he was a material factor in bringing on the fight, he was, as between himself or his wife and the Insurance Company, chargeable with the consequences. If the fight was the cause of the mortal injury, and he was the cause of the fight, whether in whole or in part, he was, to that extent, the cause of his own death. If he begat the fight, and the fight begat the shooting, and the shooting begat the injury, he bore an ancestral relation to the last offspring as well as to the first. At all events, being father to the fight, neither he nor his wife, under the terms of this policy, could profit by the fight or by what it brought forth. That, according to the evidence in this case, there was a fight, admits of no possible question. There was hostile contact, physical collision, an attempt by each combatant to hurt the other; blows were given by one, which took effect; strokes were made by the other, which missed their aim. The origin of the fight is equally manifest. It was not born of the passion of one of the parties, but of a conjunction of the passions of both. It proceeded from an altercation in which each party used rash and insulting language; language calculated to excite anger and provoke conflict. Both being in the same room, but some distance—say twenty feet—apart, the other party spoke abusively of secret societies and their members, referring to them in general terms; no particular society or member (so far as appears) being mentioned. This speech was made in the hearing of the insured and several others, but was not addressed to him. Some of the others, who were nearer to the speaker, remonstrated with him upon the impropriety of his animadversions. Shortly afterwards, as the speaker was passing by the insured on his way out, the latter, without rising from his seat, said to him mildly, in a tone of mortified resentment: "I heard all you said about secret societies; that no gentleman would belong to a secret society." The other answered: "Yes, I said it; and, by G—d, it is true. Do you want to take it up?" The insured replied, "Well, it's a lie," or "a damned lie;" adding, "Yes, I do." Then followed a blow from one of them, probably the former, and the latter "tumbled off his seat," possibly as the result of receiving the blow. They backed towards one of the entrances to the room, several feet, and the insured was stricken by his antagonist several times with a small walking cane, which was broken over his shoulders. The insured struck back with his hands without effect, several of his blows missing their aim. Then, while the other maintained his position close to where the fight took place, the insured moved back ten or twelve feet to the seat which he had occupied, and looked for and inquired after his hat, which had fallen or been knocked from his head. The other combatant, without changing his position, then drew a pistol, and fired the fatal shot. Before anything above referred to was said or done, the parties were aware of each other's presence in the room; they had spoken together in a friendly way, each calling the other by his first, or Christian, name. In substance, this is the whole story of the quarrel, the fight, and the homicide, as told by the testimony. The first insult came from the slayer, attended with a challenge to fight. The question, "Do you want to take it up?" propounded in anger, does not, according to the common understanding of it in Georgia, import a proposal to debate or discuss, but a challenge to the arbitrament of force, or a trial of the issue by the personal prowess of the disputants. It is the end, not the beginning, of argument. It is no less significant of defiance than was the ceremony of throwing down the glove as a preliminary to trial by battle. The insult was returned by the insured by responding in words of foul opprobrium,—words so irritating that gentlemen rarely address them to their equals, except when they intend to back them with their courage; and, to make the intent clear in this instance, the challenge was accepted in the superadded phrase, "Yes, I do." Instantly active hostilities commenced, each party having thus declared his willingness to champion his side of the trivial and needless quarrel. Had not both of them acted with hot-headed rashness in passing insults, there would have been no fight. Had the insured squarely objected to fighting, and tried to keep out of it, there is no reason to suppose he would have failed of success. Instead of so doing, he provoked his adversary by giving him the lie, most probably with a profane prefix to the offensive imputation; and, instead of pursuing a pacific policy, he accepted what he must have understood as a challenge to fight. No doubt he was under the influence of strong passion, but this is no excuse for him in the present litigation. The fighting was in a public place,—that is, a place to which a portion of the public habitually resorted. It was a room occupied and used as a saloon and restaurant, in the City of Atlanta. The fight, merely as such, was a joint offense, and would be classified, under our Code, as an affray. Code, § 4515. This is true, notwithstanding the evidence indicates none of the blows dealt by the insured took effect, and that the first blow, as well as all others which reached their object, came from his antagonist. In so far as the constituents of a fight are concerned, the consent of both parties makes the consequent violence of either chargeable to both. "We think the judge was in error in saying there must be mutual blows to constitute a mutual combat. There must be a mutual intent to fight. But we think, if this exists, and but one blow be stricken, that the mutual combat exists, even though the first blow kills or disables one of the parties." Tate v. Skate, 46 Ga. 157, 158 (McCay, J.). To the like effect is a dictum by Chief Justice Pearson, of North Carolina, who says: "Is it necessary that both parties should give and take blows, or is it sufficient that both parties should voluntarily put their bodies in a position to give and take blows, and with that intent? To illustrate: Suppose Rippy had not been killed. Upon an indictment for an affray, would he not have been convicted? 'Two men go out to fight. One is knocked down on the 'first pass,' and that is the end of it. Are they not both guilty of an affray?—that is, 'a fight by mutual consent.'" State v. Gladden, 78 N. C. 155.

We are no less certain that the fight was a mutual combat, in the legal sense, than if it had been so found by the verdict of a jury under a full and proper charge from the presiding judge; and the palpable truth that fighting caused the shooting, and therefore the injury, needs confirmation by verdict just as little. The evidence is all one way; but one rational inference is possible. The shooting is accounted for easily and naturally by ascribing it to the fight. This is the proper explanation of it, whether it be regarded as a part of the fight proper or as a sequel to it. It was certainly embraced within the res gestae of the combat. It took place on the same stage and within the atmosphere of the antecedent performance. The homicide could well be treated as the culmination of the final scene,—the catastrophe of the drama. At the very least it was a bloody epilogue and not an independent afterpiece. Nor is it material that it was not down on the bill, but was wholly unexpected by one or both of the actors. Rarely, if ever, can the incidents or the result of a personal encounter be foreseen. A deadly weapon may make its appearance at the last moment, and a homicide be the result, although the fight intended and begun was one with "fist and scull" only. To fight at all is dangerous. When the combative passions are aroused and get a taste of gratification, what momentum they will acquire, and to what extremes it will carry them in their lust for more, is always uncertain. Even friendly wrestling is a door by which anger and a mortal wound may come in. Knowing the hazards attendant on physical competition and contention, this Insurance Company declined to assume the risk of accidental injury or death caused by fighting or wrestling. The insured might fight if he pleased, but he was not allowed to indulge his combative propensities at the expense of the Company; that kind of indulgence was to be at his own risk. Not that the Company might not have borne the risk for him if it had chosen to do so. In the language of Judge Scott, in Harper v. Phenix Ins. Co., 19 Mo. 509, supra: "Unless it is otherwise stipulated, the insurer takes the subject insured, with his flesh and blood and passions. The dangers to which the lives of men are exposed from sudden ebullitions of feeling are a lawful matter of insurance." But in the policy before us the Company had "otherwise stipulated." By so doing it has narrowed the range of the policy over the emotions so as to shut out all those of a pugnacious character. If both combatants contributed to bring on the fight, their relative blame or guilt has nothing to do with the relation of cause and effect between it and the homicide. Nor is it of any moment to consider whether the offense committed in the end was murder or manslaughter. With or without malice, in the technical sense of criminal law, the homicide was caused by the fight, as causation is understood and regarded in the law of contracts. The fight occasioned it, for the fight produced the shooting as a direct and immediate consequence. Who can doubt that the shooting grew out of the fight,—sprang from it directly and immediately? Had there been no fight, there would have been no shooting and no killing. It was the fight that excited the homicidal impulse, generated the desire and the purpose to kill. There was nothing else to do it. Even if the slayer was insane, or subject to homicidal mania, the mania alone was harmless; it required the superadded excitement of the fight to render it destructive. Had the insured abstained from provoking the fight or accepting a challenge, had he contributed nothing towards bringing on a useless combat, there is no probability whatever that he would have been slain. And he could no more provoke a crazy man, or accept his challenge, at the expense of the Insurance Company, than he could so deal with a sane man at the Company's expense. Indeed, it would be more hazardous to engage in an affray with a madman than with a rational being; and any reason for protecting the company against the consequences of the less dangerous fighting will apply with increased force to the more dangerous. Injuries caused by rash or needless fighting with any description of combatant are excluded from the scope of the policy. The nonsuit was properly awarded, and we have stated our reasons very fully for so deciding.

Judgment affirmed.

Catharine S. MILES
v.
CITY OF WORCESTER.

(.....Mass.....)

A municipal corporation cannot escape responsibility for the nuisance on the ground that the structure is solely for public use, where by filling a school-yard several feet above its natural level it has pushed over the retaining wall so as to encroach upon and overhang the premises of an adjoining owner.

(October 24, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Worcester County made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for injuries to plaintiff's property by reason of the alleged improper construction and maintenance of structures on the surface of defendant's land, which resulted in a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Overruled.

Defendant's land was devoted to the use of a school-house and grounds. A retaining wall was built by defendant next to, and several feet higher than the surface of, plaintiff's land. The surface of defendant's land was then raised, by filling in earth, as high as, or higher than, the wall. The evidence tended to show that the wall was originally built on defendant's land but that at the time of the trial it was over the line onto plaintiff's premises in some places a foot at the bottom, and that it had gradually leaned and bulged over so as to overhang plaintiff's premises about a foot. This condition was caused by the weight of earth behind the wall or by the action of surface water or frost.

Mr. Frank P. Goulding, for defendant:

The wall was built and maintained as a part of the estate purchased for and appropriated by the City to the maintenance of a public high-school under the Statutes.

Pub. Stat. chap. 44, §§ 2, 51.

The City is not liable to an action on account of the condition of the wall.

The wall was built and maintained solely for the public use, and with the sole view to the general benefit, and under the requirement of general laws.

In such cases, in the absence of any statute which directly or by implication gives a private remedy, no action lies in favor of a person who has received an injury in consequence of a negligent or defective performance of the public service.

Howard v. Worcester, 12 L. R. A. 160, 158 Mass. 426, and cases cited; Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344.

The fact that the injury is to property, whether real or personal, instead of to the person, establishes no distinction.

Hawks v. Charlemont, 107 Mass. 414; Tindley v. Salem, 137 Mass. 171.

If cases of trespass committed in the course of the discharge of a public duty might be distinguished from the general rule, that would not avail the plaintiff.

The count is in case and not in trespass. And the proof is of a consequential injury resulting from a defective performance of a lawful act.

1 Chitty, Pl. 117, 118.

There is no liability for the consequences of a structure falling or encroaching on another's land if it was properly built on the defendant's own land.

The doctrine of Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 1 Exch. 265, has never been adopted in this Commonwealth, at least in the extreme application of it found in Nichols v. Marsland, L. R. 10 Exch. 255.

Gorham v. Gross, 125 Mass. 232, 239; Smith v. Boston Gas-Light Co. 129 Mass. 318; Bryant v. Bigelow Carpet Co. 131 Mass. 491, 499.

Messrs. W. S. B. Hopkins and Frank B. Smith, for plaintiff:

The line of cases of which Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 324, and the much later case of Howard v. Worcester, 12 L. R. A. 160, 158 Mass. 426, are types, does not apply. They are actions for personal injury sustained either on the public land or, if off the public land, as the immediate result of an act done thereon in the execution of work to adapt it for public use, or in the performance of acts for the public safety or enjoyment.

Tindley v. Salem, 187 Mass. 171; Fisher v. Boston, 104 Mass. 87; Hafford v. New Bedford, 16 Gray, 297; Bigelow v. Randolph, 14 Gray, 541; Benton v. Boston City Hospital, 140 Mass. 18; Clark v. Waltham, 128 Mass. 567.

The question here is between adjacent land-owners and relates to their mutual rights as such. If the encroachment on adjacent land depriving its owner of its use and doing him damage "is not necessarily incident to the accomplishment of the public object but to the improper and unskillful manner of doing it, such damage to private property is not warranted by the authority under color of which it is done and is not justifiable by it. It is unlawful and a wrong for the redress of which an action of tort will lie."

Perry v. Worcester, 6 Gray, 544; Haskell v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 208; Sprague v. Worcester, 18 Gray, 193.

The same principle applies to the negligent and improper maintenance of public works and makes the damage resulting therefrom an actionable tort, especially when it results in trespass or nuisance on real estate.

Childs v. Boston, 4 Allen, 41; Bates v. Westborough, 7 L. R. A. 156, 151 Mass. 174; Proprs. of Locks & Canals v. Lowell, 7 Gray, 223; Hildreth v. Lovell, 11 Gray, 845.

No new or different principles govern this case because this public land was bought by the City instead of being acquired under an exercise of the right of eminent domain.

Wilson v. New Bedford, 108 Mass. 261.

Where there is a physical appropriation and no statutory taking the action of tort lies.

Lund v. New Bedford, 121 Mass. 286.

When, in consequence of a taking of land for public use, injury results to a landowner which is not to be contemplated and does not fall 13 L. R. A.

within the general rule of compensation, an action of tort will lie.

In those cases there was a physical invasion of the real estate of the private owner and a practical ouster of his possession.

Northern Transp. Co. of Ohio v. Chicago, 99 U. S. 635, 642, 35 L. ed. 336, 338; Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 80 U. S. 13 Wall. 166, 20 L. ed. 557; Eaton v. Boston C. & M. R. Co. 51 N. H. 504; Sinnickson v. Johnson, 17 N. J. L. 129.

An injury of that class need not be intentional or contemplated, and does not inevitably necessarily any perpetual or permanent occupation of, or right in land, or that any title to it is acquired by the taking. What deprives the owner of the ordinary use and enjoyment of his land is a taking and appropriation.

Cooley, Const. Lim. § 544; Hooker v. New Haven & N. Co. 14 Conn. 146; Canal Appraisers v. People, 17 Wend. 571, 604; Lackland v. North Missouri R. Co. 81 Mo. 180; Ashley v. Port Huron, 35 Mich. 296, 301; Arimond v. Green Bay & M. Canal, 81 Wis. 316; Thurston v. St. Joseph, 51 Mo. 510, 516; Nevisin v. Peoria, 41 Ill. 502, 510; Stetson v. Faxon, 19 Pick. 147, 158; Grand Rapids Boom Co. v. Jarvis, 30 Mich. 808, 321; Pettigrew v. Evansville, 25 Wis. 223; Dodson v. Cincinnati, 34 Ohio St. 276; East Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Schollenberger, 54 Pa. 144.

Although it has been decided that the Legislature has constitutional power to permit and suffer certain acts to be done which, but for such legislative permission, would amount to a private nuisance, this doctrine has never been carried so far as to extend to a case where the nuisance is so great as practically to deprive the owner of private property of the use and enjoyment of his property.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is obvious that the defendant's wall, in its present position upon the plaintiff's plan, must be deemed an actionable nuisance, unless the defendant can claim exemption from responsibility on some special ground. Codman v. Evans, 7 Allen, 431; Nichols v. Boston, 98 Mass. 39, 43; Fay v. Prentice, 1 C. B. 828.

The defendant suggests that it is not liable, because the wall was built and maintained solely for the public use, and with the sole view to the general benefit, and under the requirement of general laws; and that the case cannot be distinguished in principle from the line of cases beginning with Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, and ending with Howard v. Worcester, 153 Mass. 426, 12 L. R. A. 160.

We are not aware, however, that it has ever been held that a private nuisance to property can be justified or excused on that ground. The verdict shows a continuous occupation of the plaintiff's land by the encroachment of the defendant's wall. The question of negligence in the building of the wall is not material. The erection was completed, and was accepted by the defendant, and is now in the defendant's sole charge, and if it is a nuisance the defendant is responsible. Staple v. Spring, 10 Mass. 72, 74; Nichols v. Boston, supra. Such an occupation of the plaintiff's land cannot be excused, for the reasons assigned. A city cannot enlarge its school grounds by taking in the land of an adjoining owner by means of a wall or fence. The public use and the general benefit will not justify such a nuisance to the property of another. If more land is needed, it must be taken in the regular way, and compensation paid. But if by the action of the elements, or otherwise, without the plaintiff's fault, the defendant's wall comes upon the plaintiff's land and continues there, it becomes a nuisance, for which the defendant is responsible, and so are the authorities. Gorham v. Gross, 125 Mass. 282, 289; Khron v. Brock, 144 Mass. 516, 4 New Eng. Rep. 424; Eastman v. Meredith, 36 N. H. 284, 296; Hay v. Cohoes Co. 2 N. Y. 159; Tremain v. Cohoes Co. Id. 163; Weet v. Brockport, 16 N. Y. 161, 172, in note; St. Peter v. Denison, 58 N. Y. 416, 421; Cumberland v. Willison, 50 Md. 183; Harper v. Milwaukee, 80 Wis. 385; Pumpelly v. Green Bay & M. Canal Co. 80 U. S. 18 Wall. 168, 181, 20 L. ed. 557, 561; Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 985.

The case is distinguishable from Middlesex Co. v. McCue, 149 Mass. 103, where soil from the defendant's land upon a hill-side was washed into the plaintiff's mill-pond by the rains, when the defendant had built no artificial structure, and had done nothing more than to cultivate his land in the ordinary way.

Exceptions overruled.

Della May FRANKLIN.

(.....Mass.....)

A divorce will not be denied to a man in case of his wife's adultery by reason of the fact that he married her while under arrest on bastardy process, merely to have the child born in wedlock and on an agreement with her that they should never live together, which they have kept.

(October 24, 1891.)

EXCEPTIONS by libellant to a ruling of the Superior Court for Worcester County dismissing his libel filed to obtain a divorce from his wife because of her alleged adultery. Sustained.

The evidence proved that the libellant had had sexual intercourse with the libelee before marriage; that the libelee was pregnant as the result of such intercourse, and the libellant was under arrest, upon a bastardy process, instituted by the libelee, at the time of their marriage; that the libellant married the libelee for the purpose, as he testified, "to give the child a name" and to have it born in lawful wedlock, and under an agreement, made with the libelee, that they should not live together as husband and wife; that immediately after the marriage the parties separated and have never lived together as husband and wife; that the marriage was performed in this Commonwealth and the libellant has resided here more than five years next preceding the filing of his libel; that since the marriage the libelee had committed the crime of adultery as charged in the libel.

Upon the foregoing evidence the court ruled that the libel could not be maintained, and dismissed it.

Messrs. W. S. B. Hopkins and Frank B. Smith, for libellant:

I. Although the parties married under an agreement that they should not live together as husband and wife, the marriage was legal and binding, and the collateral agreement "not to live together as husband and wife," was a mere nullity, so far as the legality of the marriage was concerned, as contrary to the policy of the law.

II. The agreement to separate and the living apart do not bar a decree for subsequent adultery.

The fact that the separation was by agreement and mutual consent negatives any finding of desertion on his part.

Morrall v. Morrall and Beeby v. Beeby, supra.

Especially is this so under the stringent Massachusetts rule, which holds that the presumption of the legitimacy of a child born in lawful wedlock can only be rebutted by evidence which proves beyond all reasonable doubt that the husband could not have been the father.

Phillips v. Allen, 2 Allen, 453; Sullivan v. Kelly, 3 Allen, 148.

No appearance for libelee.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The libellant and libelee became husband and wife by virtue of a lawful marriage. The agreement that they would not live together had no effect upon the marriage contract entered into in regular form in the presence of a magistrate or minister authorized to solemnize marriages. It is against the policy of the law that the validity of a contract of marriage or its effect upon the status of the parties should be in any way affected by their preliminary or collateral agreements. Barnett v. Kimmell, 85 Pa. 18; Harrod v. Harrod, 1 Kay & J. 4, 16.

The consummation of a marriage by coition is not necessary to its validity. The status of the parties is fixed in law when the marriage contract is entered into in the manner prescribed by the Statutes in relation to the solemnization of marriages. Eaton v. Eaton, 122 Mass. 276; Jackson v. Winne, 7 Wend. 47; Dumaresny v. Fishly, 8 A. K. Marsh. 368; Patrick v. Patrick, 3 Phillim. 496; Dalrymple v. Dalrymple, 2 Hagg. Consist. 54.

The libellant is not guilty of such a marital wrong as will prevent him from obtaining a divorce on the ground of his wife's adultery. The parties lived apart by mutual consent, and on the facts reported neither could have obtained a divorce from the other on the ground of desertion. In such a separation there was no desertion within the meaning of the word in the Statutes in relation to divorce. Lea v. Lea, 8 Allen, 419; Thompson v. Thompson, 1 Swab. & T. 281; Cooper v. Cooper, 17 Mich. 205.

Living apart by agreement is no bar to a suit for divorce brought by either against the other on the ground of adultery. A voluntary separation is not a license to commit adultery; and it has uniformly been held that, in case of adultery under such circumstances, the innocent party may have a remedy against the other in a suit for a divorce. Morrall v. Morrall, L. R. 6 Prob. Div. 98; Beeby v. Beeby, cited in 1 Hagg. Consist. 140, note; Mortimer v. Mortimer, 2 Hagg. Consist. 810; J. G. v. H. G. 38 Md. 401; Anderson v. Anderson, 1 Edw. Ch. 380, 6 L. ed. 179.

The court has jurisdiction, notwithstanding that the parties have never lived together as husband and wife within this Commonwealth. The continuous residence of the libellant in the Commonwealth for more than five years next preceding the filing of his libel brings the case within the exception stated in Pub. On the facts stated in the bill of exceptions the divorce should have been granted, and the entry must be, exceptions sustained.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

Edward ROBERTS et al., Appls.,

v.

CITY OF LOUISVILLE et al.

(.....Ky.....)

1. An injunction against the passage of a municipal ordinance to authorize the illegal transfer to an insolvent board of commissioners of a wharf owned by the city in trust for the public, may be granted at the suit of taxpayers who by reason of their business have a special or peculiar interest in its use, where the prevention of the transfer might not be possible if the ordinance were passed and its consummation would result in irreparable injury to plaintiffs.

NOTE.—Injunction to prevent passage of a municipal ordinance.

The decisions generally deny the power of a court to enjoin the passage of a municipal ordinance. Harrison v. New Orleans, 33 La. Ann. 222; Crescent City L. S. L. & S. H. Co. v. Jefferson Police Jury, 32 La. Ann. 1192; People v. New York, 32 Barb. 35, 9 Abb. Pr. 264, 10 Abb. Pr. 144; Warwick v. New York, 28 Barb. 223; Chicago v. Evans, 24 Ill. 52.

This proposition has been qualified by adding the proviso that the proposed ordinance is not beyond 18 L. R. A.

the scope of the corporate powers and will not work irreparable injury. Murphy v. East Portland, 42 Fed. Rep. 308.

And it has been expressly held that an injunction may be granted to prevent the board of supervisors of a city from passing an ordinance which is outside of the scope of their powers where it would work an irreparable injury. Spring Valley Water-Works v. Bartlett, 8 Sawy. 559, 16 Fed. Rep. 615.

But supervisors will not be restrained by injunction from paying illegal claims if it is not in excess

2. Withdrawal of an illegal ordinance after commencement of the suit will not defeat the right to an injunction against its passage.

(October 8, 1891.)

APPEAL by complainants from a decree of the Louisville Chancery Court in favor of defendants in a suit brought to enjoin the passage of a municipal ordinance. Reversed.

The facts are fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Lane & Burnett and T. L. Burnett for appellants.

Mr. H. S. Barker for appellees.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There was introduced in the general council of the City of Louisville, referred to a joint committee of the board of aldermen and board of councilmen, and a report agreed, by a majority of that committee, to be made in favor of passage of the following ordinance: "That the mayor be and he is hereby authorized to convey by deed of special warranty to the commissioners of the sinking fund of the City of Louisville all of the real property fronting on the Ohio River acquired and held by the City for wharf purposes. Said commissioners are to hold said property upon the same trusts and for the same purposes as it is now held by said city, and to have the same power over, and authority to sell, convey, lease, or otherwise dispose of, the same, or part thereof, which said City now has. This ordinance to go into effect from and after its passage."

But, before the ordinance was reported back by the committee, though on the same day of a regular meeting of the general council, the plaintiffs, now appellants, commenced this action against the City of Louisville, mayor, members of the general council (sued by names), and commissioners of the sinking fund, to obtain an injunction, which was granted temporarily, restraining the general council passing, and the mayor approving, that or any ordinance for like purpose, and the City of Louisville conveying, and commissioners of the sinking fund taking possession of, controlling, or interfering with, any property acquired or held by the city for wharf purposes. The plaintiffs, who are numerous, state they are residents and owners of property in said City subject to municipal taxation, and engaged there in commercial business; that the City of Louisville has heretofore, by virtue of Acts of the Legislature, and with money procured by taxation, acquired at various places within its corporate limits along Ohio River, land to be held and used, and which has so far been kept and maintained, in aid of its commerce and trade, for public wharfs, those using them for business purposes being required to pay wharfage; that, although the City of Louisville holds said property for public use, without right to transfer to another its power and duty to preserve and maintain public wharfs, and the commissioners of the sinking fund are without right to acquire or hold it for any purpose, yet the general council, mayor, and commissioners of the sinking fund have wrongfully and unlawfully agreed and conspired together for the City of Louisville to abdicate its right to and possession of said property, refuse hereafter to preserve and maintain it for the purpose intended, and by deed convey it to the commissioners of the sinking fund, with a view and to the end the latter may sell, convey, or transfer it at discretion to private individuals, thereby preventing public use of the wharfs, which is indispensable to the business of plaintiffs and others similarly situated. They further state that said ordinance, already prepared and sent by the mayor to the general council, in pursuance of the scheme mentioned, will be at once passed, followed by immediate transfer of the property, and irreparable injury thereby done to the plaintiffs, unless the injunction be granted; and, the commissioners of the sinking fund being insolvent, there will be no adequate remedy at law. No answer was filed by the mayor, nor any member of the general council, except A. S. Stoll, of the board of aldermen, who, denying he was in favor of the passage of the ordinance, yet admitted it had been sent by the mayor to the general council for passage, and would have passed both boards thereof, if the injunction had not been granted. The City of Louisville by the city attorney, answered, denying its alleged want of power of their jurisdiction. Merriam v. Yuba County, 72 Cal. 517.

The rule that the legislative action of a municipal corporation cannot be enjoined applies to prevent an injunction against the passage of an ordinance allowing gas companies to lay pipes in streets in violation of an exclusive privilege previously given to another company. Montgomery Gaslight Co. v. Montgomery, 4 L. R. A. 616, 87 Ala. 245; Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 44 Iowa, 505.

In the absence of bad faith a municipal council cannot be restrained from passing an ordinance within the scope of their authority to vacate a street. Meredith v. Sayre, 32 N. J. Eq. 557.

And an ordinance within the scope of the power of the municipality to provide for the payment of money without providing means of payment will not be enjoined although the amount of the proposed indebtedness will exceed the lawful limit. Murphy v. East Portland, 42 Fed. Rep. 306.

In California the Statute prohibits an injunction to prevent a legislative Act by a municipal corporation. Alpers v. San Francisco, 32 Fed. Rep. 503.

But the grant of a franchise by a city council, 18 L. R. A.

although it takes the form of a resolution, may be restrained by injunction. People v. Sturtevant, 9 N. Y. 233; Davis v. New York, 1 Duer, 451.

And tax-payers may enjoin the acceptance of an ordinance by a street railway company which would complete a contract in abuse of the corporate powers of the city. Cincinnati Street R. Co. v. Smith, 29 Ohio St. 291.

An injunction in limine will not lie to prevent a mayor from signing an ordinance passed by the municipal council purporting to repeal a previous ordinance which constituted a contract. New Orleans Elev. R. Co. v. New Orleans, 39 La. Ann. 127.

And an injunction will not issue to restrain the approval of an ordinance or resolution declining a trust for a charity where the city is not required by charter or ordinances to accept and administer it. Dailey v. New Haven (Conn.) post, —.

On the same principle that applies to ordinances the proceeding of a council to impeach a city officer is beyond the reach of an injunction. State v. Orleans Civil Dist. Ct. Judges, 35 La. Ann. 1075.

B. A. R.

to transfer to another the wharf property; and, though it was averred the ordinance had, since commencement of the action, been withdrawn, there was no denial it was introduced, referred to a committee, and would have been at once passed, and the purpose of it carried out, but for the injunction. The commissioners of the sinking fund in their answer denied that the free and uninterrupted use of the wharves is, as alleged in the petition, indispensable to prosecution of the business of the plaintiffs, and, in substance, averred existence of power in the City of Louisville to transfer, and not only its own power, but, because charged with payment of the City's bonded debt, also its right to hold and control, the wharf property, and revenues arising therefrom.

It seems to us the pleadings in this case, independent of any testimony, placed beyond question that the mayor, members of the general council, or a majority of them, and commissioners of the sinking fund did agree upon the scheme mentioned in the petition for a transfer of the wharf property, and, if not restrained, would have carried it out; and if the power to make such transfer does not exist that scheme was, as charged, wrongful and unlawful; but whether the injunction sought was, in whole or in part, the proper remedy is the question for determination. The power of a municipal corporation to acquire land for the purpose of erecting wharves thereon, and to charge wharfage, is not a necessary incident of its charter, but must, like all its other powers, be derived directly from the Legislature; of course to be exercised within the limits and upon conditions of the grant. Dillon, Mun. Corp. § 110. And, looking to the nature and purpose of such special grant, it must be regarded as a trust, involving duties and obligations to the public and individuals which cannot be ignored or shifted; for the power to acquire implies duty of the municipality, through its governing head, to maintain and preserve wharf property for benefit of the public, without discrimination or unreasonable charges for individual use. In every instance, so far as we have observed, wharf property of the City of Louisville has been acquired under Act of the Legislature, and paid for by taxation; and in no case is there evidence of legislative intention that it should be held otherwise than in trust for use of the public, and in aid of trade and commerce. The wharf property being so held, the City of Louisville cannot transfer its title or possession, nor, according to a plain and well-settled principle, can the general council, which is by statute invested with power of control, and burdened with duty of maintaining, preserving, and operating the wharves, either delegate the power or disable itself from performing the duties. Id. §§ 96, 97. It is even more manifest that "the commissioners of the sinking fund," which is a distinct corporation, created by that name for specified purposes, and invested with limited power, cannot hold or control the wharf property, authority to do so being nowhere given by its charter; nor would it be either provident or consistent with the purpose of its creation to so invest it.

We thus have a case where the defendants have either admitted, or failed to deny, they were about to jointly do an act, not only, in our opinion, illegal, but of so serious a nature as transfer of the title of real property, held in trust by the City of Louisville, and change of its control from the general council, that has its powers and duties in respect thereto prescribed and defined, to a corporation, without right to own or hold it, and which, according to an uncontroverted charge in the petition, is insolvent. It is moreover apparent there would be, in case of such transfer, great danger of the wharf property being so managed as to impair its usefulness to the public, and seriously injure, if not prevent altogether, the successful prosecution of the business of plaintiffs and others; for it is hard to see what is the purpose of the commissioners of the sinking fund in seeking or accepting possession and control of the property, if not to increase revenue therefrom, by increasing wharfage beyond the present, and, it may be assumed, reasonable, rates, or else, by lease or transfer to particular persons, who, in consideration of special privileges or advantages, not enjoyed generally, would pay more than now received. The plaintiffs in this case are engaged in buying and shipping stove coal to Louisville for sale and delivery, which has to be landed at the city wharves, and the free use thereof, at reasonable charges, is obviously indispensable to their business. Consequently they would suffer a special and peculiar injury, distinct from that of the public, in case of either excessive wharfage or obstruction of free public use of the wharf property. "It is," says Dillon, "the prevailing and almost universal doctrine in this country that property holders or taxable inhabitants have the right to resort to equity to restrain municipal corporations and their officers from transcending their lawful powers, or violating their legal duties, in any mode which will injuriously affect the tax-payers; such as making an unauthorized appropriation of the corporate funds, or an illegal or wrongful disposition of the corporate property, or levying and collecting void and illegal taxes and assessments." Section 914. And, though the question of power to enjoin illegal and wrongful disposition of corporate property has not been, at the suit of tax-payers, directly presented to and decided by this court, the power of equity, in such action, to restrain the levying and collecting void and illegal taxes, which is founded on the same principle, has been distinctly recognized and sustained. Therefore, if, when this action was instituted, the ordinance in question had been already passed, it could undoubtedly have been maintained against the mayor and commissioners of the sinking fund, restraining the former from conveying, on behalf of the City of Louisville, title of the property, and the latter from taking possession of or interfering with it; for the plaintiffs had legal capacity to bring and prosecute the action. An act not only illegal, but of irreparable injury to them, was intended, and about to be committed, and they would have had no adequate remedy at law.

But it is contended in argument, and seems to have been the ground for dismissing the action, that a court of equity will not enjoin passage by a municipal body of an ordinance or resolution. In High on Injunctions (§ 1243), relied on by counsel, it is said: "It is unquestionably true that purely legislative Acts, such as the passage of resolutions or the adoption of ordinances by a municipal body, even though alleged to be unconstitutional and void, will not be enjoined, since it is not the province of a court of equity to interfere with the proceedings of municipal bodies in matters resting within their jurisdiction, or to control in any manner the exercise of their discretion. A distinction, however, is properly drawn between the case of restraining an alleged act attempted under the authority and sanction of a municipal body and restraining the corporation itself from granting such authority." But in the same section it is conceded that "the question of equitable interference by injunction with the legislative action of municipal bodies has given rise to some apparent conflict of authority, and is not wholly free from doubt." It is said by Dillon (§ 308) "to be settled that it is competent for the Legislature to delegate to municipal corporations the power to make by-laws and ordinances, with appropriate sanctions, which, when authorized, have the force, in favor of the municipality and against persons bound thereby, of laws passed by the Legislature of the State;" and in a note cases are cited in which is stated the general proposition that courts will not enjoin the passage of unauthorized ordinances, and will ordinarily act only when steps are taken to make them available. Of course, if every municipal ordinance has the quality and force of a law of the State Legislature, courts of equity would be without power to enjoin or otherwise interfere with passage of any; because, on account of the peculiar structure of the state government, each of the three departments thereof is distinct and acts in its own sphere, independent of the others. But the power delegated to a municipality to legislate is not, as to all subjects, absolute even within corporate limits. On the contrary, it is not only restricted by statute, but also subordinate to settled principles of law and equity, in view of which it is presumed to be delegated; for such a corporation is created for a double purpose, and consequently has a dual character,—one governmental or public, the other private or proprietary. As said in Oliver v. Worcester, 102 Mass. 489: "The distinction is well established between the responsibilities of towns and cities for acts done in their public capacity, in the discharge of duties imposed on them by the Legislature for their public benefit, and for acts done in what may be called their 'private' character, in the management of property and rights voluntarily held by them for their own immediate profit and advantage as a corporation, although inuring, of course, ultimately for the benefit of the public." It was in reference to its governmental or public character that it was, in the case of Louisville v. Com., 1 Duvall, 295, held that a city or town in this State, "to the extent of the jurisdiction delegated to it by its charter, is but an effluence from the sovereignty of Kentucky, governs for Kentucky, and its authorized legislation and local administration of law are legislation and administration by Kentucky, through the agency of that municipality."

But a municipal corporation, when holding, in its private or proprietary character, property or funds in trust for taxpayers and inhabitants within its limits, occupies towards them a relation like that of a purely private corporation to its cestui que trustent, who are its shareholders; for in each case the corporation or its governing body is a trustee. And, if creditors or shareholders may maintain an action against the board of directors (the governing body of a private corporation) to prevent or avoid an illegal and wrongful act, as unquestionably they can do, why may not taxable inhabitants maintain one against a municipal corporation and its governing body, the city council or board of trustees, to prevent, as well as avoid, an act, illegal and wrongful, done or about to be done in relation to property, or funds held in trust? In High on Injunctions (§ 1241) is this language: "The restrictions thus placed upon equitable interference with the action of municipal corporations do not extend to cases where the act sought to be enjoined is in excess of the corporate power, but are limited to cases of a conceded jurisdiction, within the bounds of which the municipal power is acting; and, while it is thus shown equity will not enjoin the action of municipal corporations while proceeding within limits of their well-defined powers, as fixed by law, it has undoubted jurisdiction to restrain them from acting in excess of their authority, and from the commission of acts ultra vires." Though it is not quite clear from the language used whether the test of jurisdiction is meant to apply to acts of municipal corporations done as well in their public as private character, it is manifest such restraining power, to be effectual, must operate upon the general council of a city or board of trustees of a town; for acts done in excess of authority, or ultra vires, cannot be committed by a corporation except by its governing body or head; and such must have been intended to be the meaning and scope of the proposition, for several leading cases in England are cited in which the power of a court of equity to enjoin passage of an illegal ordinance is distinctly recognized.

The case of Des Moines Gas Co. v. Des Moines, 44 Iowa, 505, cited by counsel, was as to the power of equity to enjoin passage of an ordinance repealing a former one, under which a contract had been made with the plaintiff. It was held by the court that the municipal council had, in reference to the matter, discretionary power, and was acting within the scope of it, and was neither violating a trust nor doing an irreparable injury to the plaintiff; and, though it was there said, in general terms, that the ordinance in question had the force of an Act of the Legislature, and could not be enjoined, it was still conceded that one creating a public nuisance might be, because it could not be a rightful subject of legislation, and the mischief therefrom might be irreparable, which was in effect a concession of the power in every case of like conditions.

In People v. Dwyer, 90 N. Y. 402, it was upon principle and authority of previous decisions in that State, held that, while equity will not ordinarily interfere with matters resting largely in the discretion of municipal authorities, when the threatened action will produce irreparable injury, and consist in an illegal grant or the disposition of property, by devoting it, in whole or in part, to the use of a private corporation, or where an illegal grant is threatened, or the action attempted is corrupt and fraudulent, and an abuse of trust, the court may interfere by injunction to restrain passage of an ordinance for the purpose. In our opinion, the general proposition, a court of equity may not enjoin passage of a municipal ordinance, must be confined in its application to subjects over which the corporation, in its governmental or public character, has discretionary authority; and, if it be conceded taxable inhabitants have a right to resort to equity at all to restrain a municipal corporation and its officers from making an illegal or wrongful disposition of corporate property, whereby the plaintiffs will be injuriously affected, it reasonably follows the power exists to enjoin passage of the ordinance authorizing the act whenever irreparable injury will be done to the plaintiffs, and they have no adequate remedy at law; for, from its nature, a preventive remedy may be applied at the inception of a wrongful act, in fact when it is about to be done, or is threatened. There may, however, be subjects in relation to which the municipal corporation has discretionary power to legislate, and with which courts of equity, upon grounds of expediency and policy, will not interfere in the absence of fraud or breach of trust. But this is not such case, for the plain legal duty is imposed upon the general council to hold, control and manage the wharf property for use of the public, which cannot be evaded by transfer of it, or otherwise. Yet passage of the ordinance in question might have been, if it was not, actually intended to be followed so soon by transfer of the property as to put it out of the power of the plaintiffs, and all other parties aggrieved, to prevent consummation of the wrongful act. We think a court of equity has not only the power to restrain passage of an ordinance authorizing an illegal or wrongful disposition of property acquired and held, as is the case of the wharf property, but, if needful, to compel the general council to perform the duty of preserving, protecting and maintaining it for the purpose intended, though of course leaving it to the discretion of that body as to the manner of discharging its trust.

It is stated in the answers that the ordinance was withdrawn after commencement of the action, and was not before the general council when the trial was had. But, as the plaintiffs had a cause of action, withdrawal of the ordinance did not have effect to defeat their right to the relief sought, especially as another ordinance of the same character may be hereafter introduced and passed, unless the right to do so be perpetually enjoined. The judgment dismissing the action, being, as already indicated, erroneous, is reversed, and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kalamazoo County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for an alleged assault and battery. Reversed.

NOTE.—Rights of hackmen and other solicitors of patronage at depots, wharves, etc.

Most recent American decisions deny the right of a carrier to grant a monopoly of the hack, bus, or baggage business at its depot; thus, the exclusive right to use the platform of a railway company for receiving and discharging passengers cannot be granted by the company to one hack owner. Montana Union R. Co. v. Langlois, 8 L. R. A. 753, 9 Mont. 419.

Neither can the exclusive use of the more convenient and accessible portion of a platform be given to one bus line, even if the owner has at his own expense constructed an additional platform for such use. Cravens v. Rodgers, 101 Mo. 247, 42 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 656.

Neither can a monopoly of a railroad company's grounds for a hack and bus stand and the solicitation of passengers be granted to the owner of one line of hacks. Kalamazoo H. & B. Co. v. Sootema, 10 L. R. A. 819, 84 Mich. 194. Contra, Com. v. Carey, 6 New Eng. Rep. 371, 147 Mass. 41.

This same rule against a monopoly is denied by a Massachusetts decision in the case also of a baggage expressman. Old Colony H. Co. v. Tripp, 6 New Eng. Rep. 366, 147 Mass. 86.

earlier ones, are in accord with these Massachusetts decisions. Thus it was held that a bus proprietor is not entitled as a matter of right to drive into a station yard, although such privilege is accorded to others. Barker v. Midland R. Co. 18 C. B. 16.

And that a railroad company may give an exclusive privilege to one line of public carriages to come within its station yard unless the railroad commissioners have made an order to the contrary, Hole v. Digby, 27 Week. Rep. 684.

And an injunction was refused to prevent the exercise of an exclusive privilege sold by a railroad company to the proprietor of public carriages within its station yard where no substantial injury to the public was shown. Beadell v. Eastern Counties R. Co. 2 C. B. N. S. 502; Painter v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. 2 C. B. N. S. 702.

But in another case it was held that an exclusive privilege to one bus proprietor of using the station yard of a railroad company is, in the absence of special circumstances to show it to be reasonable, a breach of the prohibition made by 17 & 18 Vict., chap. 31, §2, against granting undue and unreasonable preference. Marriott v. London & S. W. R. Co. 1 C. B. N. S. 499.

Preference by a railroad company to its own carrying vans as against other carriers by receiving Messrs. Hawes & Luby for appellee.

Long, J., delivered the opinion of the court: This is an action for damages for assault and battery, which cause was commenced in justice court, where plaintiff had judgment for $6 damages and $3.25 costs of suit. Defendant appealed to the Circuit Court for the County of Kalamazoo, where the cause was tried before a jury on March 6, 1891, and plaintiff had judgment for $40 damages and costs of suit. Defendant brings case to this court by writ of error. The plaintiff was a hackman, and went to the depot of the Michigan Central Railroad Company in pursuit of his legitimate business of soliciting the carriage of passengers from the incoming trains to the hotels and private residences in the city. He was in the employ of a Mr. Waud, who owned the hack and outfit. Arriving at the depot on the day upon which the assault was committed, he took a place upon the depot grounds of the railroad company with his hack, and, upon being told by the depot master that that place had been assigned to another hack, he refused to yield the place. The defendant is the depot master at that depot. The depot grounds occupy the space covered by the railroad track of the Michigan Central Railroad Company in what was formerly a street, and which had been vacated for the construction of the railroad. The grounds also include the entire north part of block 15 in the city, bounded north by the vacated street, and south by an alley. The title to this north part of block 15 is in the railroad company, and these are the lands upon which the plaintiff entered and stood with his hack, and from which he refused to remove to another part of said grounds. It appears that the railroad company on April 25, 1890, made certain rules for the management of its depot grounds, and for the regulation of hack and bus drivers thereon, and for assigning stands for their vehicles in their business of soliciting passengers. These rules were promulgated by the depot master, who located the stands for the hack and bus men, telling each where to stand his vehicle. The stands located were indicated by numbers from 1 to 9, respectively, and 1 to 7 had been assigned and occupied by different hackmen prior to the occurrence complained of, and there was space yet left upon said grounds unassigned, which plaintiff might have occupied on that day. On September 15, 1890, plaintiff drove onto the grounds for passengers, and took possession with his hack of stand No. 8, which was not assigned to him, and which he knew had been assigned to another under the rules of the company. The defendant, the depot master, requested him to vacate the stand for a party who wanted and was entitled to it. This plaintiff refused to do, and the defendant pulled him from his hack, and ejected him from that place, offering to assign him another place upon the company's goods at later hours is an undue and unreasonable preference under the same Act. Re Palmer, L. R. 6 C. P. 194.

So as to discrimination between its own agent and others, by requiring a special order from the others describing the particular goods to be delivered to him for a consignee instead of recognizing a general order for the delivery of all goods received for the consignee. Re Parkinson, L. R. 6 C. P. 554.

An unlicensed hack driver specially ordered for a steamboat passenger is not a trespasser in going to meet him, with his carriage, upon a wharf used by the steamboat company to discharge passengers, although the rules of the wharf forbid any but private carriages or licensed hacks to stand upon it. Griswold v. Webb, 7 L. R. A. 302, 16 R. I. 649.

Exclusion from car, vessel or inn.

A carrier which has established for its own profit and the convenience of passengers on its car or vessel an agency for the delivery of baggage can exclude all other persons from entering its own car or vessel to solicit orders in competition. Barney v. Oyster Bay & H. S. B. Co. 67 N. Y. 801.

A steamboat company has also been upheld in refusing to take on board as a passenger the agent of a line of stage coaches who sought passage merely to solicit business where the company had made a reasonable contract with another line for the transportation of all its passengers who chose to go on that line. Jencks v. Coleman, 2 Sumn. 221.

An inn-keeper cannot exclude one stage driver and admit his rival to solicit business in the inn. 18 L. R. A.

but it is otherwise if the driver forfeits his right by misconduct. Markham v. Brown, 8 N. H. 523.

General regulations; exclusion from depot or platform.

A railway company cannot suspend the operation at its depot of a municipal ordinance prohibiting licensed hackmen and porters from soliciting business at railway depots. Chillicothe v. Brown, 38 Mo. App. 600.

But an ordinance prohibiting hackmen from going within twenty feet of a train at a depot has been held invalid as against a privilege granted to a hackman by the railroad company. Napman v. People, 19 Mich. 362.

A railroad company cannot exclude a hackman from every part of the depot while he has a check for baggage of a passenger, although it may eject him from a room other than the baggage room in which he is soliciting business against the rules of the company. Summitt v. State, 8 Lea, 413.

The solicitation of the business of passengers by inn-keepers on railroad platforms may also be prohibited. Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 586.

And an inn-keeper or his agent soliciting patronage against the rules of the company may be ejected from the platform of a railroad depot. Landrigan v. State, 31 Ark. 50.

Injury from defect in platform.

A railroad company is liable to a hackman to the same extent that it would be liable to a passenger for an injury from a defect in the platform when he came there in the prosecution of his business. Tobin v. Portland, S. & P. R. Co. 59 Me. 188. B. A. R.

grounds, which plaintiff refused. It is apparent from the record that the defendant used no more force than was necessary to eject the plaintiff from that particular place. The defendant was acting, in thus ejecting plaintiff from that part of the grounds, under the rules of the railroad company. These rules were as follows: "(1) Location for omnibuses and hacks will be assigned to parties, who will occupy them while standing at the depot to get passengers. (2) Drivers must take the stands which are assigned to them, and will not be allowed to take places assigned to others. (3) The positions assigned must not be occupied more than twenty minutes previous to the arriving of passenger trains. (4) Each driver must remain by his hack or omnibus when soliciting passengers. (5) No hacks or omnibuses will be allowed to stand in the porch longer than necessary to load or unload passengers. (6) The drivers of hacks and omnibuses will not be allowed in waiting rooms, except on business. (7) Profane, obscene, boisterous language, or quarreling, will not be allowed on the depot grounds. (8) Only one transfer wagon will be allowed to stand at the baggage-room, which will be the baggage-wagon that is hired by the railroad companies to transfer baggage between the different depots."

The court below charged the jury that "it would be competent for the railroad company to make such a rule as is included in these,—that the hackmen should not come to the station for passengers earlier than twenty minutes before train-time. That rule would be good, and could be enforced. The company could also make a rule that the hackmen should not stand within a certain distance of the platform of the station. That rule would be good. But, without enlarging upon these, there is one rule which the court, as a matter of law, following what the court conceives to be a decision of the supreme court on the same matter, holds is not good, and that is the rule that hackmen should be assigned places at the platform for the receipt of passengers, and that these places assigned should be occupied by no others. This the court holds, as a matter of law, is not good." It appeared upon the trial that the plaintiff at the time of the assault was not engaged in making any disturbance, or using any boisterous, vulgar, or obscene language, and was in no way offending against the rules of good order and decorum. The only question for consideration, therefore, is whether the rule adopted by the company reserving the right upon its own grounds to assign places to the different hackmen, and excluding from those places others not assigned thereto, is a reasonable one, and which the company had a right to enforce. The court below was in error in supposing that the rules adopted by the railroad company, and which were sought to be enforced by the defendant, were in conflict with the opinion of this court in Kalamazoo, H. & B. Co. v. Sootsma, 84 Mich. 194, 10 L. R. A. 819. That was an action of trespass against the defendant for unlawfully entering upon a piece 18 L. R. A.

of ground near the depot in question, the plaintiff claiming in that case to have leased that particular piece of ground, with the right to use it to the exclusion of all others; and it was held by this court that the railroad company had no right to give to one hack and bus company the right to the use and occupancy of a portion of its depot grounds to the exclusion of others in a like business, and that the railroad company could not arbitrarily admit one common carrier of passengers or freight to its depot grounds, and exclude all others, for no other reason than that it is for its own profit or pleasure to do so. In the present case it appears that under the rules adopted by the company these stands were fixed and numbered, and the different carriers assigned to their places, for the sole purpose of accommodating the traveling public in coming to and departing from the depot, and to prevent quarrels among the hackmen as to place, and the annoyance occasioned thereby. Before these rules were adopted it appears that the hackmen came there with their vehicles at all times of the day; sometimes left their hacks to stand a half day at a time, and leaving the depot grounds so foul that in hot weather it was almost impossible for people to pass on account of the odors; and the railroad company was compelled from time to time to remove the gravel to abate the nuisance. The rules adopted were reasonable rules, and were intended by the railroad company to convenience the traveling public. They in no manner give place to one hackman to the exclusion of another, and they deprive no common carrier of necessary approach to the depot grounds to carry on his business of carrier of freight and passengers. The rules touch and affect all alike. The mere fact that the railroad company fixes and determines the place where each particular hack shall stand is not a discrimination between hackmen, but is a necessary rule to prevent quarrels for place, so often seen among hackmen around depots. There can be no doubt that the railroad company has the right and authority to make and enforce all reasonable rules to restrain hackmen from committing offenses against good order on their grounds, and to regulate their conduct while there. Com. v. Power, 7 Met. 596; Markham v. Brown, 8 N. H. 528.

It must be held that the rules adopted and heretofore set forth are reasonable, and that the court was in error in holding otherwise. Inasmuch as it appears that the defendant acted under the direction of the railroad company, and was only attempting to enforce those rules and regulations, and that he used no more force than was necessary to eject the plaintiff from the place he unlawfully attempted to occupy and hold, the court should have directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant.

The judgment of the court below must be reversed, with costs of both courts. No new trial will be ordered.

The other Justices concurred.

Rehearing denied.

CITY OF WABASH, Appt.,

v.

EH CARVER, Admr., etc., of Joseph Carver, Deceased.

(.....Ind.....)

1. Attempting to cross a bridge on a public highway which is in constant use, with a traction steam engine, water tank, and threshing machine, is not per se negligence as matter of law.
2. A general averment that decedent was without fault in an action brought to recover damages for the death of one killed by the fall of a highway bridge is not overcome by specific averments that he was attempting to cross the bridge with a traction steam engine water tank, and threshing machine, so as to render the complaint bad.
3. A statute imposing upon the county commissioners the duty to build all highway bridges of a certain class does not relieve the town in which one of them is located from damages for injuries resulting from the bridge being out of repair, where another statute gives cities and towns exclusive control over the bridges within their respective limits.

NOTE.—Negligence in construction and care of highway bridges.

The fact that a bridge leads up to and joins a street at the corporate line of a town does not make it a town bridge in such a sense as to relieve the county from the general duty of using reasonable care to keep it in a reasonably safe condition for passage. Owen County v. Washington Twp. 121 Ind. 379.

It is gross negligence on the part of a city to allow a hole to remain in a bridge on one of the principal streets for a period of from five to twenty days. Griffin v. Johnson, 84 Ga. 279.

Whether neglect to keep the flooring of a bridge spiked is negligence warranting recovery for damages depends upon whether bridges with unspiked floors are usually safe. Zimmerman v. Conemaugh (Pa.) 2 Cent. Rep. 361.

Liability for neglect to keep in safe condition.

Counties are liable for negligence in constructing bridges, where it results in injury. Knox County v. Montgomery, 6 West. Rep. 917, 109 Ind. 69; Cooper v. Mills County, 69 Iowa, 350.

Where the intention of the Legislature was to impose the duty of keeping a bridge in repair jointly upon the county and a town, both are liable for damages occasioned by a want of repairs; and the fact that the town officers have always made the necessary repairs, receiving one half of the expenses thereof from the county, does not relieve the county from its liability. Lyman v. Hampshire County, 1 New Eng. Rep. 227, 140 Mass. 311.

An action does not lie against a county for damages caused by neglect to repair a bridge, it not appearing that it was a toll bridge, or such a one as was built by a contractor, and that there was a failure to take the proper bond of indemnity required by such sections as were applicable to the subject. Jackson, Ch. J., and Hall, J., dissent. Gwinnett County v. Dunn, 74 Ga. 358.

A county is not liable for injury resulting from a horse becoming frightened at a plank standing upright in a bridge out of repair, with actual notice to the county, the horse not having entered the bridge, and the county not being obliged to main-

4. A verdict for $1,000 damages for the negligent killing of a widower seventy-three years old, who was strong and vigorous for his age and actively engaged in business, will not be set aside as excessive although his children are all of mature years and not dependent upon him for support.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wabash County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries resulting in death and alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Alvah Taylor and Harry Pettit for appellant.

Messrs. Cowgill, Shively & Cowgill for appellee.

A township is liable for patent defects in a bridge which the supervisors neglected to repair; it is not liable for latent defects, unless the supervisors had knowledge of defect and time to repair. Zimmerman v. Conemaugh (Pa.) 2 Cent. Rep. 361.

Cities, towns and villages.

A city which constructed a bridge is liable for an injury resulting from the defective condition of one side of the bridge, although the other side is safe for travel. Walker v. Kansas City, 90 Mo. 647.

A public bridge within the limits, and located upon, a public highway of a city, constitutes a part of such highway so as to render the city, which has taken charge of the latter, liable to a person suffering injury or loss, without fault or negligence, in consequence of the neglect of the city to keep the bridge in repair. Goshen v. Myers, 119 Ind. 196.

Finding that the city has taken charge of and graded the highway is sufficient to sustain the conclusion that the city is liable for defects in the bridge. Ibid.

To render a town liable for a defect in or the insufficiency of a bridge, it is sufficient that the officers were in fault or guilty of a neglect of duty in not repairing the bridge, which was unsafe, and that the defect or insufficiency or want of repair was the cause of the accident or injury. Koenig v. Arcadia, 75 Wis. 62.

No formal acceptance by a village is required to hold it liable for the safety of a bridge within its limits. Marseilles v. Howland, 14 West. Rep. 564, 124 Ill. 547.

Notice of defect to fix liability.

With reference to defects in a bridge, a county should be held to know what, by the exercise of reasonable care, it might have known. Howard County v. Legg, 9 West. Rep. 212, 110 Ind. 479.

Counties, through their proper officers, are chargeable with knowledge of the tendency of timber to decay. Ibid.

Where to all appearances a stringer of a bridge, which broke, causing injury to plaintiff's horses,

McBride, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a suit by the appellee, as administrator of Joseph Carver, deceased, to recover damages for his death, which was caused, it is alleged, by the actionable negligence of the appellant. The complaint charges that a certain bridge within the corporate limits of the City, "over what is known as the 'Wabash & Erie Canal,' where Miami Street in said City crosses said canal, the said street being a public highway and street of said City, and said bridge, forming a part of said street and highway, and being in almost constant and incessant use by the traveling public of said City and surrounding country in crossing said canal where the same has been erected, was suffered by said City to become and remain greatly out of repair, and in a state of decay and insufficiency for the purposes and uses for which it was erected, and dangerous for all who should pass over the same, the stringers, beams, and timbers under and supporting the floor of said bridge becoming entirely rotten, of which rotten and unsafe condition the officers of said City were informed and well knew, and by reason thereof unfit and unsafe to be traveled over; the same being allowed and suffered to get into such unsafe, dangerous and rotten condition by said City and its officers by the defendant's carelessness, negligence, and the utter disregard of the safety of those who had a right to pass over the same. . . . That on said 8th day of August, 1887, the said Joseph Carver, now deceased, the personal representative of whom is this plaintiff, being then in good health, and without any knowledge of the unsafe and dangerous condition of said bridge, or that the timbers supporting the floor thereof were rotten, and without any fault, want of care, or negligence on his part whatever, and believing it was entirely safe to so do, and as he had a right to do, attempted to pass over said bridge from the north side of said canal to the south side thereof, along said street, with what is known as a 'traction steam-engine' and water-tank and threshing-machine attached thereto. And plaintiff avers that when said engine passed onto said bridge, the same being at the time conducted, guided, and managed in a prudent and careful manner, the said deceased then sitting on a seat provided and used for the purpose, and engaged in guiding and steering said engine, the timbers beneath the floor of said bridge and supporting the same, because of their neglected, decayed, was sound upon the surface, in the absence of actual knowledge or notice to the township, the question in determining the township's liability is whether due diligence was used in discovering the defect, and as to whether the authorities neglected to do that which common prudence and caution required in order to ascertain the condition of the timber. McKeller v. Monitor Twp. 78 Mich. 486.

That, a short time before an accident occasioned by a defective bridge, the town authorities caused certain repairs to be made in the bridge, is evidence of sufficient notice to require them to make a thorough inspection of the structure. Spaulding v. Sherman, 75 Wis. 77.

Liability for injuries from fall of bridge.

An instruction in an action against a county for injuries sustained by reason of the falling of an unsound bridge, that the measure of damages is the value of the horses killed, and a sum equal to the amount of damage which the evidence shows to have immediately resulted to plaintiff's other property from the accident, and any expenses necessarily incurred by him as the natural and immediate result of the accident, correctly states the measure of damages. Ford v. Umatilla County, 15 Or. 313.

A town is not liable if a bridge falls because of an extraordinary rain storm, when in condition to resist an ordinary storm. Jordan v. Hannibal, 8 West. Rep. 795, 81 Mo. 673.

To render a municipality liable for a defect in a bridge it must have had notice or the defect must have existed so long that the municipality, by ordinary care, would have discovered the defect in time to repair it. Ibid.

A town is liable for negligent construction of a bridge, as well as for failure to keep it in repair. Ibid.

That a person drove upon a bridge at a trot, without stopping and examining it, is not evidence of contributory negligence. Ibid.

Not required to provide against extraordinary uses.

A township is not liable for accidents, where a bridge was built and maintained so as to protect 13 L. R. A.

against injuries likely to occur by ordinary use. It is not required to provide against extraordinary uses, as where plaintiff carried an unusually heavy load. McCormick v. Washington Twp. 2 Cent. Rep. 584, 112 Pa. 185; Gregory v. Adams, 14 Gray, 242; Clapp v. Ellington, 20 N. Y. S. R. 413.

Whether a traction engine used for a threshing machine with tank attached is of such unusual and extraordinary weight that no recovery can be had for injury thereto by breaking through a bridge is a question for the jury. Clapp v. Ellington, 20 N. Y. S. R. 413; McCormick v. Washington, 2 Cent. Rep. 584, 112 Pa. 185.

But by N. Y. Laws 1887, chap. 536, a town is not liable for injury in such cases to a traction engine weighing four tons or over.

A town is liable for an injury to an elephant by the breaking of a bridge while he was crossing it if the jury find that it was proper to take him across it under the circumstances. Gregory v. Adams, supra.

A county is not liable, under Ala. Code 1886, §1456, for injuries sustained by a horse which has escaped from pasture, by falling through a defective bridge, as the statute requires the bridge to be "safe for the passage of travelers and other persons. Lee County v. Yarbrough, 85 Ala. 500.

The owners of the bridge are not liable for injuries from breaking through it, where the load exceeds the limit established by statute. Dexter v. Canton Tollbridge Co. 5 New Eng. Rep. 704, 79 Me. 568.

Under a statute limiting the weight which a team may haul across a toll-bridge, the weight of the driver is included. Ibid.

The fact that a public bridge gives way and a traveler is injured is not of itself sufficient to charge the county, but it must appear that the authorities were guilty of actionable negligence. Wabash County v. Pearson, 120 Ind. 426.

On a trial for a claim for an allowance against a county for injuries sustained by falling through a defective bridge, there can be no inquiry as to the validity of the proceedings by which the board of commissioners assumed to establish the highway. Knox County v. Montgomery, 6 West. Rep. 917, 109 Ind. 68.

and rotten condition, broke and gave way, and precipitated said engine into said canal, catching and crushing said Joseph Carver between said engine and the water-tank attached thereto, causing and producing his instant death," etc. The complaint is in two paragraphs, which are substantially alike, except that one paragraph charges actual knowledge by the officers of the City of the defective condition of the bridge, and the other avers facts sufficient to charge them with notice, but does not charge actual notice. The circuit court overruled demurrers to each paragraph. In this the appellant insists the court erred.

The specific defect which the appellant contends makes the complaint bad is that, notwithstanding the averments that the decedent was without fault, the specific averments are sufficient to overcome this, and show that he was guilty of contributory negligence. A reference to the complaint above quoted will show that the averments of freedom from fault on the part of the decedent are much more full than are usual, and more full than required by the precedents in this State.

In the case of Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Walker, 113 Ind. 196-198, 12 West. Rep. 781, the court said: "It has long been the rule in this State that the general averment that the plaintiff was without fault is sufficient, unless the facts specially pleaded clearly show that he was guilty of contributory negligence." The writer of the opinion cites many authorities abundantly sustaining the rule thus stated, and, in addition, very clearly vindicates its soundness on principle. The specific averments which it is insisted control the general averments negating contributory negligence are those showing that the decedent attempted to cross the bridge with a traction steam-engine, with water-tank and threshing-machine attached. To sustain the appellee in this contention we would be obliged to hold that to attempt to cross a bridge on a public highway, which is in constant use, with a traction steam-engine, water-tank, and threshing-machine, is in itself negligence per se. This we cannot do. In the case of Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Farver, 111 Ind. 193, 9 West. Rep. 621, it is stated as a fact of which the court takes judicial notice that such engines have become familiar in every agricultural community; that they are customarily moved from place to place over the public highways; and that such use of the highways has become so common that it must be supposed that horses of ordinary gentleness have become so familiar with them as to be safe under ordinary guidance. Whether this assumption of judicial knowledge is fully justified or not need not be here considered. But it certainly cannot be true that an averment showing that the decedent was using the bridge in a manner that had become usual and common necessarily carries with it an inference of contributory negligence so strong that it overcomes all of the usual averments that he was free from fault. No other objection is made to the complaint, and we think it is clearly good. The appellant filed an answer in three paragraphs, the third paragraph of which avers that the bridge was one the construction of which cost over $500. To this paragraph the court sustained a demurrer. This answer proceeds on the theory that because the Statute (Elliott, Supp. § 1521; Acts 1885, p. 74) makes it the duty of boards of county commissioners to build all bridges within the corporate limits of any city or town within the State the estimated cost of which exceeds $500, this inferentially relieves cities and towns of the duty of keeping such bridge in repair. The answer is plainly bad. Cities and towns are by statute (§§ 8161, 8387, Rev. Stat. 1881) given exclusive power and control over the streets, alleys, highways, and bridges within their respective limits. It was said by this court in the case of Goshen v. Myers, 119 Ind. 196, that "it was evidently the intention of the Legislature, by the passage of this Statute, to have all public bridges within the limits of the cities in the State of which they may take control, under the absolute management of the common council of such cities, and to charge them with the duty of keeping such bridges in repair." The Act of March 7, 1885, which includes section 1521, Elliott, Supp., above referred to, while it imposes the duty of construction upon the board of county commissioners in certain cases, does not purport to in any other manner interfere with the absolute control of the city over the bridges; nor does it relieve cities from the duty of keeping them in repair. In our opinion, that duty still rests upon them.

Complaint is also made that the damages assessed are excessive, and that the court erred in instructing the jury as to the measure of damages. There is some confusion in the record over the instructions given and refused, and after the appellant's original brief was filed, a writ of certiorari was awarded for the correction of the record. The corrections and changes in the record made by the return to this writ removed much that previously appeared objectionable. We deem it unnecessary to incumber the record by bringing into this opinion the instructions given and refused. A careful examination of all of them leads us to the opinion that the jury were sufficiently and correctly instructed as to the measure of damages, and that the appellant was not harmed by the refusal of the court to give any instructions asked by it. Indeed, as we understand appellant's counsel, the objection now is not so much that the court erred in giving and refusing instructions as that the jury erred in assessing damages. The decedent was about seventy-three years old, a widower, and his children were all of mature years, and none of them dependent upon him. The jury awarded $1,000 damages. This, the appellant insists, was so excessive that the verdict should be set aside. The evidence showed that the decedent, notwithstanding his years, was strong and vigorous for his age, and actively engaged in business. In cases of this character, as said by Judge Davis in the case of Barron v. Illinois Cent. R. Co., 1 Biss. 453, "there is no fixed measure of damages, and no artificial rule by which the damages in a given case can be computed." The jury are necessarily given a somewhat wide range of discretion. We cannot say that that discretion has been abused in this case, and that the damages awarded were excessive.

Judgment affirmed.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the General Term of the Court of Common Pleas for the City and County of New York in favor of defendants after considering exceptions, directed to be heard by it in the first instance, to the dismissal by the trial term of the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Seaman Miller, for appellant:

The alleged West Virginia Corporation is fraudulent and void, and cannot be recognized by the courts of this State as a legally constituted corporation.

The corporation, being the mere creature of local law, can have no legal existence beyond the limits of the sovereignty where created. The recognition of its existence, even by other States, and the enforcement of its contracts made therein, depend purely upon the comity of those States.

New Yorker once tried to outwit and commit a fraud upon the laws of New York and New Jersey in precisely the same way that the five persons who are the defendants in the case at bar sought to evade the laws of New York and West Virginia. It was decided that the corporation could not be recognized by any court in New Jersey as a legally constituted corporation, nor be dealt with as such.

The court erred in dismissing the complaint and in not allowing the jury to pass upon the facts.

Ridenour v. Mayo, 40 Ohio St. 13; Empire Mills v. Alston Grocery Co. (Tex. App.) 12 L. R. A. 366.

Messrs. W. Bourke Cockran and Wales F. Severance for respondents.

Peckham, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff alleged in her complaint that the defendants were a joint-stock company doing business in New York City under the name and style of "America's Winter Carnival Company." It was further alleged that they were the owners of the toboggan slides used at Fleetwood Park, in the City of New York, and that such slides were under their management and control. The plaintiff also alleged that she had, while riding on one of the toboggans upon one of the slides in the possession and management of defendants, been accidentally and seriously injured through the carelessness of defendants or their employes, and she demanded judgment for $25,000 damages. The defendants, by answer, denied that they were a joint-stock company, and also denied the allegations that they were the owners of the toboggan slides mentioned, or that they were under their control; and they denied all allegations of negligence, either on their own part or on that of any of their employes. Upon the trial the plaintiff gave no evidence as to the defendants being a joint-stock association, but endeavored to prove a joint or partnership liability of defendants, based upon the allegation that the grounds where the accident occurred were owned by the New York Driving Club, and that in the fall of 1887 the grounds were leased by it to the defendants for the purpose of putting up these toboggan slides. The evidence tending to show even a prima facie liability on the part of the defendants is of the most meager character. We will assume, however, that the plaintiff proved enough to call upon the defendants for an answer to her cause of action. This answer was, in brief, that the defendants were nothing but individual members of and stockholders in an incorporated company which had hired the grounds, owned the toboggans, and operated the slides; and that whatever liability there was, if any, in favor of the plaintiff, was borne by the incorporated company, and not by the individual stockholders therein. To prove this defense the counsel for defendants offered in evidence a certificate of incorporation of the America's Winter Carnival Company, as organized under the laws of West Virginia, and at the same time he offered the Code of West Virginia in evidence. The certificate and the Code were objected to by the plaintiff's counsel on the ground that there was no allegation in the answer of the existence of a corporation or the incorporation of the America's Winter Carnival Company, and that it was necessary to plead such fact before defendants could avail themselves of the defense. The certificate was further objected to as incompetent, immaterial, and illegal. The objections were overruled, and plaintiff's counsel duly excepted.

The first ground of objection, as to the necessity of pleading the defense founded on the incorporation, was properly overruled. It was not a defense necessary to be pleaded. It went to the root of the cause of action, and tended to show there never had been any liability on the part of defendants. It was not an affirmative defense which in substance admitted an original cause of action, but showed facts which operated as a satisfaction thereof. It was not like a defense of payment, or a release, or an accord and satisfaction. If operative, it showed there had never been any liability; and hence it was admissible under defendant's denial of any liability as set out in the complaint. The certificate, when read in evidence, showed that it was signed by the secretary of state of West Virginia, and that it was issued under the great seal of that State, and in it the secretary declared that the corporators therein named, and their successors and assigns, were from the 12th day of December, 1887, until the first day of January, 1895, a corporation by the name and for the purpose set forth in the certificate. It was subsequently proved, under objection and exception, that this company was at the time of the happening of the accident in possession of the toboggan slide in question, and was the owner thereof.

As to the second ground of objection taken by plaintiff's counsel to the introduction of the certificate,—that it was incompetent, immaterial, and illegal,—we may assume that it raises the question of the validity of the incorporation itself, and of its sufficiency as a defense. Upon this issue a few additional facts must be stated. The Code of West Virginia, which was received in evidence, shows that a corporation of the kind herein spoken of could be formed under the general laws of that State by five or more persons signing an agreement to the effect stated in the statute, and by the payment by each corporator of at least ten per cent of the par value of the stock subscribed for by him. Affidavits on the part of at least two of the corporators, stating necessary facts, were also required by the Statute. It is further therein provided that the agreement, acknowledgment, and affidavits are to be delivered to the secretary of state, and he issues to the corporators his certificate, under the great seal of the State, declaring, among other things, that they and their successors and assigns are a corporation from that date until a time therein specified. The effect of the certificate is provided for by the Statute, which says that the corporators and their successors and assigns shall, from the date of the certificate until the time designated therein, be a corporation, and the certificate shall be received as evidence of such incorporation. The Statute provides for the holding of meetings of the corporation, including the first general meeting for purposes of organization, out of the State, and it also provides for keeping the principal office of the corporation in any State or Territory of the United States, and it permits the corporation to adopt by-laws, and to prescribe the qualifications of directors, and, if it be not otherwise provided, every director must be a stockholder and a resident of the State of West Virginia. The certificate in question in this case embodies an agreement among five corporators, by which they agree to become a corporation by the name of "America's Winter Carnival Company," for the purpose of leasing premises for amusements,—among others, for toboggan slides; and they agree that its principal office shall be in the City of New York; and in this agreement they recite that they have subscribed a certain sum (named therein) to the capital of the company, and have paid ten per cent thereof, and that the capital so subscribed was divided into shares of $100 each, which were held by them. The names of the corporators were signed to the agreement, and their residences were therein stated as being in the City of New York. The agreement, properly signed and acknowledged, was presented to the secretary of state of West Virginia, and a certificate of incorporation duly issued, as already stated. From the evidence it is clear, upon the question of user, that there was a person who acted as president of this company under a so-called election, although it does not appear how or when he was elected. That person was a resident of New York. There was also a person who acted as treasurer of the company, and he also resided in New York. The treasurer kept a check-book, and made disbursements for the company by check, and received what money came to it, and put it in the bank. There were no by-laws. The treasurer once had charge of the stock-book of the company, though at the time when he was sworn on the trial he did not know where it was, and he supposed the company was not then in existence. Admission to the grounds occupied and possessed by this company was charged, and the money that was paid for admission to the toboggan slides went through the treasurer's hands. No one could get in without paying toll, excepting members of the driving club. The president and vice-president were directors, as was also the treasurer and one other stockholder. This company was in possession of the toboggan slides when the accident occurred, "and no other concern or individuals or anybody else." The defendant Grant said he had stock in the company, which he paid for, and that he refused to go into the business at all unless under an incorporation. The books of the company were not produced, and it did not appear what, if any, books had been kept by it, other than the stock and check books spoken of by the treasurer.

This is substantially all that appears in regard to user by the corporation; and the counsel for plaintiff, upon this evidence, moved to strike out the certificate of incorporation, and all the testimony relating thereto, on the ground "that the directors of the concern were residents of New York, and that under the Statute of West Virginia it was necessary, in order that the corporation be duly incorporated, that the directors of the concern should be residents of West Virginia, unless a special resolution were passed by the corporation permitting persons of any other State to be such directors." The motion was denied; and thereupon, on motion of counsel for defendants, the complaint was dismissed because no cause of action was proved against the defendants personally. There was sufficient evidence of user to make it clear that the company had accepted its charter, with all its privileges and liabilities, whatever they might be. This question of user, although not specifically taken in the above objections, has been urged upon us here by the counsel for the appellant, and we think it well enough to say what we have upon the subject. As to the other points which have been actually raised by the motion to strike out the certificate, we think a proper disposition was made of them by the court below.

By the Statute of West Virginia the incorporation precedes the election of directors. After the incorporation, and subsequent to the issuing of the certificate thereof by the secretary of state, the corporators named therein, or a majority of them, are directed by statute to appoint a time and place for holding a general meeting of the stockholders to elect directors, make by-laws, and transact other business. A failure to adopt a by-law at the first meeting, permitting the election of nonresident directors, and the election of nonresident directors at such meeting or at a subsequent one, in the absence of a by-law permitting it, would not ipso facto dissolve the corporation, or take away its corporate rights or franchises. The company would still remain a legal entity, notwithstanding its failure to adopt the proper by-law, or, in its absence, to elect resident directors. The counsel for plaintiff was therefore in error in his statement as to the law of West Virginia.

✓ We come, then, to the question whether, upon the facts already set out, this corporation was so far valid as to be entitled to recognition as such in the courts of our State. The plaintiff says it clearly appears that the corporators thereof were citizens of New York, and the corporation was formed by them in the State of West Virginia for the sole purpose of doing business out of that State and in the State of New York, in which latter State its principal office was also to be located. These facts, he says, conclusively prove the invalidity of the West Virginia corporation, so far at least as this State and its citizens are concerned. If mistaken in that view, he still urges that such facts render it a question for the determination of the jury whether the incorporation was attempted to be made in good faith, or as a mere evasion and in fraud of the laws of West Virginia or of New York. He claims, if the jury should find the purpose was one of evasion, that in such case the incorporation would furnish no defense, and the defendants would be liable as individuals. We are quite clear the case should not be submitted to a jury to pass upon the question of evasion as matter of fact. If it were, we might find different juries coming to different conclusions upon the same facts, and we should have a corporation or no corporation according to the view a jury might take of such facts. One plaintiff might prove the evasion to the satisfaction of one jury, and another plaintiff fail on precisely the same facts; and thus we should have a corporation as to A., and no corporation as to B., and the same question constantly arising as often as the corporation or its members were sued. This would be intolerable. It must be a corporation as to all persons with whom it has business dealings, or as to none. In other words, it must be a question of law, instead of fact. The courts of any country recognize foreign corporations through what is termed "national or state comity" (Merrick v. Van Santvoord, 34 N. Y. 208; Bank of Augusta v. Earle, 38 U. S. 18 Pet. 519, 10 L. ed. 274; Christian Union v. Yount, 101 U. S. 852, 25 L. ed. 886); but whether such recognition shall be given must be decided by the courts of the country where the corporation seeks to do business. In our State, as in others, it is a question of domestic policy, and what that policy is must be determined by an examination of our own legislation. If we find any direct enactment upon the subject, it is our duty to obey it; and in its absence we must determine the question with reference to our general legislation, and to the circumstances which surround us as a great and growing commercial community, having need of and employing large amounts of combined capital, and for whose prosperity and growth it is of the utmost importance that such capital should have the greatest facilities extended it for useful employment, with reasonable and proper personal exemptions from liability. We can find no reason for a domestic policy that should exclude from recognition by our courts foreign corporations generally. It may be safely said there can be no such domestic policy at the present day in a civilized State. The question then arises, Shall we go behind the certificate of incorporation or charter of a foreign corporation for the purpose of inquiring under what circumstances, and for what purpose outside the charter, it was incorporated? This can only be claimed on the ground that the charter was obtained in fraud or evasion of the laws of the State which granted it, or for the purpose of evading the provisions of our own laws. It is plain there was in regard to the procurement of this charter no fraud upon or evasion of the laws of West Virginia, even if we should admit that such fact would constitute good ground for our refusal to recognize such corporation, although no proceedings had been taken to annul its charter in the State which granted it. This point is by no means clear. However that may be, it is impossible not to see that the State of West Virginia has adopted a policy which favors the formation of corporations within her borders, and pursuant to her laws, while the members and officers may be nonresidents, and where the principal business of the corporation is to be performed outside of the confines of the State.

The agreement which was signed by the corporators in this case, and duly acknowledged and presented to the secretary of state of West Virginia, clearly showed that the corporators were residents of New York, and that the principal office of the corporation was to be in New York; and the inference was a fair one that the principal business of the corporation was also to be conducted in New York. The secretary of state, to whom the papers for the organization of the corporation were presented, was compelled to pass upon and decide the question whether they conformed to the laws of West Virginia, before he received or filed them, or gave the certificate of incorporation. He did pass upon the question and did thereupon issue the certificate of incorporation under the great seal of the State, and attested by his official signature. So far as the laws of West Virginia are concerned, it is plain that the incorporators thereupon became a corporation, and in that State the certificate was, by the laws thereof, evidence of the existence of such corporation. There was no fraud or evasion of the law of West Virginia in thus becoming incorporated. The references to her laws above made show conclusively that the formation of corporations thus composed, and for the purpose of doing their principal business outside the limits of that State, was contemplated in those laws. This corporation was beyond all question legally incorporated, and entitled to recognition, in the State of West Virginia. Unless, therefore, it can be said that the acts of our citizens in procuring an incorporation under the laws of West Virginia for the purpose of doing business here were, as matter of law, a fraud and an evasion of our own laws, and hence in conflict or inconsistent with our domestic policy, such foreign corporation is entitled to recognition and protection in our own tribunals. Merrick v. Van Santvoord, supra.

It is urged that such acts are thus inconsistent and in conflict with our policy, because citizens of our own State are in that way enabled to evade our own laws relative to home corporations, and to avoid personal liability by incorporating under the laws of foreign States, which may be more favorable to members than are our own laws. I think, when this claim is examined in the light of our own legislation, it will be seen that there is no substantial basis for it to rest upon. An examination of our laws shows that it is, and for many years has been, the policy of this State to enlarge the facilities for the formation of corporations. General laws are on our statute-book for the formation of corporations of almost every conceivable kind, and under some one of them a corporation of the kind mentioned in this case could readily be formed. The freedom from personal liability would be as great, and could be as easily attained, under our own as under the laws of West Virginia. The security of the creditor would not be substantially greater in the case of the domestic than in that of the foreign corporation. In the latter the creditor has the remedy by attachment, and he can obtain about as easy access to its property as if it were domestic instead of foreign. There is really nothing to evade by incorporating under a foreign law. No harmful results flow to a creditor or to the community here by such incorporation. Where the corporation formed under another jurisdiction comes here to do business of a kind which we permit to be done by corporations, and where our laws provide for incorporating individuals for the purpose of doing that business, it is difficult to see how the terms "evasion" and "fraud" can be properly applied to acts of our citizens whereby they obtain incorporation in another State. When they come into our State to do business, they must conform to our laws relating to foreign corporations, and comply with the terms laid down by us as conditions of allowing them to transact business here. In the case of many kinds of corporations such conditions have already been imposed by our laws; and, if there be any kind where none is imposed, it is conclusive evidence that up to this time the Legislature has not thought it conducive to the true interests of the State and its citizens to impose them. I do not intimate that it is necessary for a State to expressly, by statute, exclude foreign corporations from acting within its jurisdiction. The policy of the State may exclude them, and that policy may be clearly established by a reference to the general legislation of a State. I find none such in the laws of this State.

It has been urged that the easy way which our laws provide for forming corporations is itself a reason why we should not recognize as a corporation those of our own citizens who have gone to another State for the purpose of incorporating themselves under the laws thereof, to do business in our own State as such corporation. We think there is very little force in the argument. The public policy which we see in our own State, as evidenced by her laws upon the subject of the formation of corporations, is one which looks to their ready and easy formation as a means of transacting business with an accumulation of capital, and an exemption from personal liability to the largest extent consistent with reasonable supervision by the State. The facilities for incorporation offered by this State are not the result of any desire to promote the formation of corporations here as against their formation in other States. They are offered because of a policy on our part which urges upon the State the propriety of furnishing them as one means of controlling the business done by them, and keeping it within our borders. If, in any particular case, it is thought by those interested in the matter that the business can be done in our own State and by our own citizens with greater facility under the form of a foreign corporation than under that of a domestic one, there is no public policy which forbids its transaction under such form. The supervision of a foreign corporation by this State may easily be exercised by imposing terms as a condition of permitting it to do business here. The absence of any such terms in our legislation forms no reason for refusing to recognize the corporation. The power rests with the Legislature to say whether any, and, if so, what, terms shall be imposed upon such corporations as a condition of granting them permission to do business here. Those terms can only be imposed by the Legislature; and in their absence our courts ought not, merely on that account, to refuse to recognize a foreign corporation. In the absence of legislation, our courts must either refuse absolutely, or else they must recognize the right of such corporations to come to this State and do business here. The courts cannot themselves impose terms or conditions.

The case of Montgomery v. Forbes, 148 Mass. 249, is not necessarily in conflict with these views. In that case, the defendant, a resident of Massachusetts, went to New Hampshire, and there executed and filed certain papers, for the purpose of forming a corporation in that State, for the reason that its tax laws were more favorable than those of Massachusetts, and because he desired to avoid personal responsibility. The whole business was to continue to be done in Massachusetts, and these steps were taken in order to avoid the laws of that State. The court held that the defendant had not complied with the terms of the New Hampshire Act, and hence had never become incorporated. There was no tribunal in New Hampshire to which the papers in regard to a proposed corporation could be submitted, and which had power to decide whether the law had been complied with, and, upon compliance to issue a certificate of incorporation. But all persons filed their papers at their peril. If the question ever arose as to a compliance with the law, it had to be decided by comparing the papers with the Statute. The Massachusetts court did that, and decided that the defendant did not comply with the New Hampshire Statute, and that no corporation had ever been formed. In Hill v. Beach, 12 N. J. Eq. 31, the court of chancery of New Jersey, in a proceeding for an accounting, said that certain persons who had entered into an agreement with a view to form a company to do business in New Jersey, and who thereupon undertook to form themselves into a corporation under the General Act of this State relative to the formation of manufacturing corporations, passed in 1848, and who complied with the forms of such Act, would nevertheless not be recognized by the courts of New Jersey as a legally constituted corporation. The chancellor said they were not a foreign corporation, "for it is perfectly manifest upon the face of their proceedings that their attempted organization under the general law of New York respecting corporations was a fraud upon the laws of that State." In what respect it was a fraud does not appear unless it were one because the corporators were residents of New Jersey, and intended to do business in that State under the New York incorporation. From what has already been said, we do not think those facts make out a case for a refusal to recognize a corporation legally constituted and existing in the foreign State.

We recognize corporations formed by the citizens of a foreign State under its laws for the purpose of doing business, among other places in our own State. Where is the essential difference between such a corporation and one legally incorporated under such foreign State for the same purpose, but the members of which are citizens of our own State? Whose rights are jeopardized more in the case where the members of the corporation are our own citizens than where they are citizens of the foreign State? What enlightened policy is violated by the recognition of the foreign corporation composed of residents of this State which would not also and equally suffer by the recognition thereof when composed of nonresidents? And yet, beyond all cavil, our policy is to recognize the latter. The truth is, foreign corporations are not properly to be regarded with suspicion, nor should unnecessary restraints be imposed upon their doing business in our midst. They carry no black flag, and the policy of all civilized nations is to grant them recognition in their courts. It seems to me that every reason which urges upon us the recognition of foreign corporations organized with power to do business in our State, and composed of citizens of the foreign State, is equally potent when the foreign corporation is composed of our own citizens. It has always been supposed that a State should at least deal as liberally with its own citizens as with those of foreign States. If, therefore, we permit foreign citizens to come within our limits in the form of a foreign corporation organized with power to do business here, and recognized by us, why should we not permit our own citizens to avail themselves of the like privilege? If we impose terms and conditions upon foreign corporations, as such, doing business here, those same terms and conditions still and equally apply to a foreign corporation when composed of our own citizens. Why should they not be placed at least upon an equality with the foreign citizen?

The case of Land Grant R. & T. Co. v. Coffey Co. Comrs., 6 Kan. 245, simply holds that the courts of that State will not recognize a corporation formed under the laws of Pennsylvania, where the corporation is not itself permitted to do business in the State which grants its charter. It was also stated in the above case that the charter, if enacted by the Kansas Legislature, would have been void as contravening two constitutional provisions. In such a case it would scarcely be expected that a foreign State would grant greater recognition and privileges than were accorded by the State under which the corporation was formed. It might readily be supposed that no rule of comity compelled the recognition of a foreign corporation formed to do acts which are prohibited by the laws of the State to its own citizens or corporations. It is upon this principle that Empire Mills v. Gaston Grocery Co. was decided by the Court of Appeals of Texas, and reported in 12 L. R. A. 366, and to which our attention has been called. The Legislature of Texas prohibited the operation of corporations in that State of the character of the Iowa corporation, and the court held that comity did not extend to the recognition of such a corporation by the courts of Texas.

After a careful examination of the case, we have come to the conclusion that the defendants sufficiently proved the existence of a valid corporation under the laws of West Virginia, and that there was nothing in the other facts proved which should cause us to refuse recognition of that corporation.

The result is that the complaint was properly dismissed, and the judgment to that effect should be affirmed with costs.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO.,

Appt.,

v.

W. H. ROGERS.

(..... Miss.)

Mental suffering alone, unaccompanied by physical injury, will not support an award of damages against a telegraph company for mere negligent failure to promptly deliver a message.

(May 25, 1891.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Lauderdale County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent failure of defendant to promptly deliver a telegraph message. Reversed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion. Messrs. W. P. & J. B. Harris, for appellant:

Mental suffering is not readily distinguishable from physical suffering and to become an element of damages it must be based on bodily injury or the injury by which it is produced must be attended by circumstances of malice, insult, or oppression.

Dorrah v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 85 Miss. 14.

The fact that in Texas, Tennessee, and Kentucky a rule different from the one which prevails in this State has been applied in suits in which telegraph companies are parties misleads some lawyers into the belief that a different or special rule applies in telegraph cases. This view is not sound.

The rule in the Dorrah Case, supra, is applied in telegraph cases.

NOTE.—Damages for mental anguish alone not recoverable.

The authorities bearing upon this proposition have been fully collated in a note to Western U. Tele. Co. v. Brown (Tex.) 2 L. R. A. 766. The conclusions outlined in that case fully sustain the decision reached in the case under review. See generally on this subject Wood's Mayne, Dam. 1st Am. ed. 54, note.

The authorities fully sustain the conclusions of the principal case and hold that where no physical injury is shown, mere mental anguish is not entitled to consideration in estimating the amount of damage. Johnson v. Wells, Fargo & Co. 6 Nev. 224; Keyes v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 36 Minn. 238; Stone v. Evans, 32 Minn. 243; Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Stables, 62 Ill. 313; Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180; Wyman v. Leavitt, 71 Me. 227; Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 598; Blake v. Midland R. Co. 10 Eng. L. & Eq. 448; Salina v. Trooper, 27 Kan. 564.

It should be borne in mind, however, that the rule of damages is not the same where the action is for a breach of contract as for a tort. In the case of wrongs, the jury are permitted to consider injury to feelings and many other matters which have no place in questions of damages for a breach of contract. Brown v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 54 Wis. 342.

The contract to marry, in which injury to feelings may be considered, stands, according to all the authorities, upon peculiar and exceptional grounds. But, "in actions for breaches of contract, the damages must be such as are capable of being appreciated or estimated." Pollock, C. B. in Hamlin v. Great Northern R. Co. 1 Hurlst. & N. 408-411.

Each case of this description must be decided with reference to the circumstances peculiar to it; but it may be laid down as a rule that generally in actions upon contracts no damages can be given which cannot be stated specifically, and that the plaintiff is entitled to recover whatever damages naturally result from the breach of the contract, but not 13 L. R. A.

damages for the disappointment of mind occasioned by the breach of the contract. Ibid.

The rule almost uniformly laid down by the courts of England and the United States is to the effect that only the pecuniary loss sustained can be compensated for, and that no compensation can be given for the mental anguish or suffering of the heirs or next of kin of the deceased. We cite only a few of the many authorities that might be cited on this point: 3 Suth. Dam. 231, 232, and cases; 2 Rorer Railroads, 645, 661, 662, 1167, and cases; 3 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. 1729, and cases; 3 Wood, Railway Law, 1596-1598, and cases; Whittaker's Smith, Neg. 434, and cases; Wood's Mayne, Dam. 74; Gulf, C. & S. R. R. Cas. 165; Holmes v. Oregon & C. R. Co. 6 Sawy. 282; Donaldson v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 18 Iowa, 230; Kansas Pac. R. Co. v. Miller, 2 Colo. 442; Field, Dam. § 630.

The term "pecuniary loss."

The word "pecuniary" in this connection is not construed in any very strict sense, and the tendency is to still greater liberality, and to include every element of injury that may be deemed to have a pecuniary value, although this value may not be susceptible of positive proof, and can only be vaguely estimated. It may include the loss of nurture, of the intellectual, moral, and physical training which a mother only can give to children. Tilley v. Hudson River R. Co. 29 N. Y. 287.

It may include the loss of expected services of children who at the time of their death are too young to render any service (Ihl v. Forty-second St. & G. St. Ferry R. Co. 47 N. Y. 817), or of children or persons under no legal or moral obligation to render service or support, if the circumstances shown render it probable it will be rendered. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205; Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Barron, 72 U. S. 5 Wall. 90, 18 L. ed. 591.

When the text-writers come to treat of the subject of mental anguish or wounded feelings as an element of damages it is generally in connection with exemplary or punitive damages.

See Field, Dam. §§ 26, 73; Sedgw. Damages, p. 654, note 1; 1 Suth. Dam. pp. 156, 782, 786; Shearm. & Redf. Neg.; Grey, Communication by Telegraph, p. 147.

Mr. Lawson's statements in "Rights, Remedies, and Practice," vol. 4, § 1970, that "in the federal courts it has been held that a husband may recover for disappointment and anguish caused by his being unable to be present at his wife's death-bed owing to the failure of the company to deliver a message," is misleading in that it is based on Beasley v. Western U. Tele. Co., 89 Fed. Rep. 181, which is a Texas case and of no more value than any other Texas case.

See Chase v. Western U. Tele. Co. 44 Fed. Rep. 554.

The rule announced in Dorrah v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. is the rule, so far as we have been able to ascertain, in England and in the United States, except in Texas, Kentucky, and probably in Tennessee.

The Texas cases are conflicting and it must be said that the courts of that State have as yet arrived at no satisfactory or fixed rule.

4 Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Pr. § 1969.

It may include the loss of the society of a near relative (Beeson v. Green Mountain Min. Co. 57 Cal. 20), and may include damages for the loss of the father by children who are of full age living away from the home of the deceased and supporting themselves. Lockwood v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 523.

A distinction noted.

The mental distress and anxiety which may be proved in actions for personal injuries is confined to such as is connected with the bodily injury, and is fairly and reasonably the plain consequence of such injury. The mental anguish, like physical pain, to be taken into consideration in such cases, is confined to such as is endured by the plaintiff in consequence of a personal injury to himself. 2 Thomp. Neg. 1258, notes 4, 5; 1 Sedgw. Dam. 7th ed. 47, note a; 2 Sedgw. Dam. 543.

Review of the dissenting opinions.

It is pertinent to note, in this connection, that in several jurisdictions a contrary rule obtains, and the doctrine of the principal case is repudiated. The supreme courts of Alabama, Indiana, Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee and Texas have distinctly affirmed the right to recover damages against a telegraph company for failure to transmit and deliver a message, where the only element of damage was mental anguish, and where there was an entire absence of either physical suffering or pecuniary loss. Western U. Tele. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510; Reese v. Western U. Tele. Co. 7 L. R. A. 563, 123 Ind. 294; Chapman v. Western U. Tele. Co. (Ky.) 30 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 626; *Thompson v. Western U. Tele. And neither the pain and suffering of the deceased nor the grief and wounded feelings of his surviving relatives can be taken into account in the estimate of damages. But as a right of action is given whenever the injured person, had he lived, could have maintained an action, at least nominal damages may be recovered. 3 Suth. Dam. 232, citing *Blake v. Midland R. Messrs. Witherspoon & Witherspoon for appellee.

Cooper, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

A telegram was sent from Chattanooga, Tenn., to the plaintiff, who resides at Meridian, informing him of the death of his brother, and the time and place at which he would be buried. If this dispatch had been seasonably delivered, the plaintiff could and would have attended the burial. By negligence of the agent of the defendant Company at Meridian, it was not delivered until after the last train had left Meridian for Chattanooga, by which the plaintiff could have traveled to attend the funeral services. This suit was brought to recover the damages sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the non-delivery of the message. The facts are undisputed. They are that the message was sent and its transmission paid for by the sender; that it was by the negligence of the agent not delivered; that the plaintiff sustained no pecuniary loss, his damages being merely nominal, unless he is entitled to recover for the disappointment of not being informed of the death of his brother in time to attend his burial. The court below instructed the jury that the plaintiff was entitled to recover as compensation damages for the mental suffering sustained by him by reason of being deprived of the privilege of attending the funeral of his brother, it being conceded that no such negligence was shown as would warrant the infliction of punitive damages. The jury returned a verdict for $800, and from a judgment thereon the defendant appeals. It thus appears that the single question presented is whether, under the circumstances named, damages for mental suffering may be recovered. It is immaterial, in the determination of the question involved, whether the action be considered as one for the breach of the contract to transmit and deliver the message, or as an action on the case for the tort in failing to perform the duty devolved on the telegraph company under the contract. The substance and nature of the default and the consequent injury are the same in either view, and, in the absence of circumstances warranting the imposition of punitive damages, the measure of damages must be the same, whatever be the form of the action. We have given to the investigation of the question that consideration which its importance demands, and, though the right of the plaintiff to recover the damages awarded in this case finds support in the decisions of several of the States, we are unwilling to depart from the long-established and almost universal rule of law that no action lies for the recovery of damages for mere mental suffering, disconnected from physical injury, and not the result of the willful wrong of the defendant. That such damages are recoverable in actions for breach of contract of marriage is well settled; but it is equally true that until recent years this action stood as the marked and single exception in which such damages were recoverable in actions for breach of contract. This action, though in form one for the breach of contract, partakes in several features of the characteristics of an action for the willful tort, and, though the damages recoverable by the plaintiff for mental suffering are spoken of as compensatory, the fervent language of the courts indicates how shadowy is the line that separates them from those strictly punitive. Harrison v. Swift, 13 Allen, 144; Kurtz v. Frank, 76 Ind. 595; Thorn v. Knapp, 42 N. Y. 475; Johnson v. Jenkins, 24 N. Y. 252; Coryell v. Colbaugh, 1 N. J. L. 77.

So much, indeed, does the motive of the defendant enter into the question of damages that in Johnson v. Jenkins he was permitted to give in evidence, in mitigation of damages, the fact that he refused to consummate the marriage because of the settled opposition of his mother, who was in infirm health. Some of the text-writers upon the subject of damages, notably Sutherland, (vol. 1, p. 156,) assuming that the action for breach of contract of marriage is not of an exceptional character, accept the measure of damages therein applied as appropriate in all actions for breach of contract where the losses sustained are not, by reason of the nature of the transaction, of a pecuniary nature. The authorities cited by Sutherland other than those in actions for breach of contract of marriage are Hobbs v. London & S. W. R. Co. L. R. 10 Q. B. 111; Ward v. Smith, 11 Price, 19; Williams v. Vanderbilt, 28 N. Y. 217, and Jones v. The Cortes, 17 Cal. 487. The first of these cases decides only that a passenger who, with his wife and two small children, were negligently disembarked by a railway at a point four miles from his destination, on a rainy night, might recover for the inconvenience of having to walk that distance, he being unable to secure a conveyance. In Ward v. Smith the damages recovered were for a pecuniary loss. Jones v. The Cortes was a case of willful wrong and fraud. In Williams v. Vanderbilt, which was an action of tort for breach of duty, the defendant had agreed to transport the plaintiff from New York to San Francisco via Nicaragua. The defendant's vessel, sailing from the Isthmus to San Francisco, was lost at sea, and he negligently omitted to supply transportation over that part of the journey. The result was that the plaintiff was exposed to disease peculiar to the Isthmus, which he contracted, and was eventually compelled to return to New York. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover for loss of time occasioned by and expenses of his sickness; the court saying: "If one of plaintiff's limbs had been broken, through the carelessness of the agents or servants of the defendant it is settled that he could have recovered the expenses of the sickness occasioned thereby, and for the consequent loss of time, and also compensation for the bodily pain and suffering caused by such breaking of the limb. The principle on which a recovery, in such case, is allowed for bodily pain and suffering, loss of time and expenses, sustains the recovery in this case for the plaintiff's loss of time and loss of health, and his expenses during his sickness." It is upon the suggestions of the text-writers, supported by authorities which have been given a strained construction, and upon a misapplication of the rule that damages for a breach of contract are commensurate with the injury contemplated by the parties, that some courts in recent years have decided that mental pain and anguish, disconnected from physical injury, furnish a substantive cause of action for which recovery may be had.

The principle of limitation applied by the courts in cases involving pecuniary loss, for the necessary protection of defendants against ruin by the infliction of speculative and remote damages, has been perverted, and accepted as the standard of measurement of damages in a class of cases in which the sole injury sustained is confessedly incapable of compensation, and in which any damages awarded must, from the nature of things, be purely speculative and uncertain. In 1881, in the case of So Relle v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 55 Tex. 808, the Supreme Court of Texas, relying upon the authority of two previous decisions in that State (Hays v. Houston & G. N. R. Co. 46 Tex. 279, and Houston & G. N. R. Co. v. Randall, 50 Tex. 261) in one of which an assault and battery had been committed on the passenger, and in the other serious and permanent physical injury had been suffered, for which damages for mental pain and anguish had been allowed, and upon a suggestion in the text of Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, unsupported by any authority, decided that the sendee of a message might recover from the company, as compensatory damages, for mental suffering caused by its failure to promptly deliver a message which announced to him the death of his mother, by reason of which default he was not informed of her death and failed to attend her funeral. This decision has been since overruled, upon a subordinate point, but the general proposition thereby established, that mental suffering, disconnected from physical injury, may be compensated for in actions for breach of contract, has been since repeatedly reaffirmed. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Levy, 59 Tex. 542, 563; Stuart v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 66 Tex. 580; McAllen v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 70 Tex. 243; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cooper, 71 Tex. 507, 1 L. R. A. 728; Loper v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 70 Tex. 689; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Simpson, 78 Tex. 422; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Adams, 75 Tex. 537, 6 L. R. A. 844; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Heegles, 75 Tex. 537; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Moore, 76 Tex. 67; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Broesche, 72 Tex. 651.

The courts of Alabama, Tennessee, Indiana and Kentucky have followed the Supreme Court of Texas, relying upon the decisions above noted as authority. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 89 Ala. 510; Wadsworth v. West- 13 L. R. A.

ern U. Teleg. Co. 86 Tenn. 695; Reese v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 128 Ind. 295, 7 L. R. A. 583; Chapman v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Ky.) 80 Am. & Eng. Corp. Cas. 626. These cases, so far as we have been able to discover, rest upon the authority of each other, finding no support in the decisions of the other States nor those of England.

In actions for injuries sustained by the negligence of the defendant, where serious bodily harm has resulted, the generally accepted rule is that the jury may, and since it is impossible to draw the line between physical pain and mental suffering in such instances, must, give damages for both. Expressions used by the courts as argument or illustration in those cases, in which damages for mental suffering are recoverable because such suffering is declared to be inseparable from physical pain and injury, have been seized upon as sustaining a right of action for mental suffering alone, or for such suffering coupled with the right in the plaintiff to merely nominal damages. Damages for mental suffering have been very generally allowed in three classes of cases: (1) Where, by the merely negligent act of the defendant, physical injury has been sustained; and in this class of cases they are compensatory, and the reason given for their allowance by all the courts is that the one cannot be separated from the other. (2) In actions for breach of contract of marriage. (3) In cases of willful wrong, especially those affecting the liberty, character, reputation, personal security, or domestic relations of the injured party. The decisions in Texas, Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana, and Alabama rest upon arguments and illustrations drawn from cases of one or the other of these classes, or upon the general proposition that damages must in all cases be commensurate with the injury sustained to the extent that they were in the contemplation of the parties to a contract, or should have been foreseen as the probable consequences of his conduct by the negligent defendant. These decisions are not in our opinion sustained by any of the analogies by which they are sought to be supported. These cases are totally different from those in which damages for mental suffering have been allowed, and it is notable that in no one of them is there a citation of a single case, decided prior to the Case of So Relle, in which an action for breach of contract (except actions for breach of contract of marriage), or in an action on the case for injuries resulting from mere negligence, damages were allowed for mental pain disconnected from physical injury. There is an absence of authority upon the direct question of the right of recovery for mere grief or disappointment, probably for the reason that prior to the So Relle Case the bar had not entertained the view that an action therefor could be maintained, but there are several cases in which responsibility for mental disturbance by reason of fright has been considered. It has been held that fright attending an accident, resulting from negligence by which bodily injury was sustained, was properly considered by the jury in awarding damages. Seger v. Barkhamsted, 22 Conn. 290; Masters v. Warren, 27 Conn. 293; Cooper v. Mullins, 30 Ga. 146; Canning v. Williamstown, 1 Cush. 451. But where there is no bodily injury damages for fright should not be given. Canning v. Williamstown, supra; Victorian R. Comrs. v. Coultas, L. R. 18 App. Cas. 222; Wyman v. Leavitt, 71 Me. 227; Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577, 598.

In Flemington v. Smithers, 2 Car. & P. 292, the plaintiff sued to recover for injuries inflicted upon his minor son and servant by the negligence of the defendant, and claimed compensation for the injury to his parental feelings, but the claim was rejected. We are not disposed to depart from what we consider the old and settled principles of law, nor to follow the few courts in which the new rule has been announced. The difficulty of applying any measure of damages for bodily injury is universally recognized and commented on by the courts. But in that class of cases demands for simulated or imaginary injuries are less likely to be made than will be those in suits for mental pain alone. No one but the plaintiff can know whether he really suffers any mental disturbance, and its extent and severity must depend upon his own mental peculiarity. In the nature of things, money can neither palliate nor compensate the injury he has sustained. "Mental pain and anxiety the law cannot value, and does not pretend to redress, when the unlawful act complained of causes that alone." Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577.

The rapid multiplication of cases of this character in the State of Texas since the Case of So Relle indicates, to some extent, the field of speculative litigation opened up by that decision. The course of decision shows how difficult the subject is of control. In So Relle's Case it was held that the sendee of the undelivered message, who had paid nothing for its transmission, might recover for the mental suffering flowing from its non-delivery. In Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Levy, 59 Tex. 564, that case was overruled, in so far as the right of action was recognized in the sendee, and it was held that only the person entering into the contract with the company might sue. But in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Cooper, 71 Tex. 507, where the husband had sent the dispatch calling a physician to attend his wife in her confinement, it was held that the husband (the sender of the message) could not recover for his mental suffering caused by the negligence of the company in failing to deliver the message, but that, suing in right of his wife (who was not a party to the contract with the company), he might recover for her mental suffering. It is held in that State that the telegraph company must be informed, either by the face of the message or by extraneous notice, of the relationship of the parties and the purport of the message, to warrant the recovery of damages for mental suffering. It has been decided that this dispatch did not sufficiently indicate these facts, "Willie died yesterday at six o'clock; will be buried at Marshall, Sunday evening" (Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Brown, 71 Tex. 728), while the following one did, "Billy is very low; come at once" (Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Moore, 76 Tex. 66). And a distinction seems to be drawn between the negligence of failing to deliver a dispatch which causes mental pain and suffering and failing to deliver one which, if delivered, would relieve such suffering.

In Rowell v. Western U. Teleg. Co., 75 Tex. 26, the plaintiff and his wife had received information of the dangerous illness of her mother. Subsequently a dispatch was sent containing information of the mother's improved condition. This dispatch the company failed to deliver. Suit was brought, but recovery was denied, the court saying: "The demurrer was properly sustained. The damage here complained of was the mere continued anxiety caused by the failure promptly to deliver the message. Some kind of unpleasant emotion in the mind of the injured party is probably the result of a breach of contract in most cases. But the cases are rare in which such emotion can be held to be an element of the damages resulting from the breach. For injury to feelings in such cases, the courts cannot give redress. Any other rule would result in intolerable litigation." The manifest effect of this decision is to deny to a party injured redress for mental suffering contemplated by the parties to the contract as the probable consequence of its breach. The distinction drawn by the court is so unsubstantial that it was evidently resorted to for the purpose of obstructing the tide of "intolerable litigation" flowing from the decisions following the So Relle Case. Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana and Alabama have but recently established the rule, the dangers and difficulties of which are becoming apparent in Texas. The "intolerable litigation" invited and appearing in Texas has not yet fairly commenced in those States. It will, however, appear in due time, and the courts will be forced to resort to refined limitations, as Texas has done, to restrict it. We prefer the safety afforded by the conservatism of the old law, as we understand it to be, and are of opinion that no recovery for mental suffering can be had under the circumstances of this case. Dorrah v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 65 Miss. 14; Salina v. Trooper, 27 Kan. 544; West v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 39 Kan. 98; Russell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 3 Dak. 815; Wyman v. Leavitt, 71 Me. 227; Lynch v. Knight, 9 H. L. Cas. 577; Victorian R. Comrs. v. Coultas, L. R. 18 App. Cas. 222; Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Stables, 62 Ill. 813; Johnson v. Wells, Fargo & Co. 6 Nev. 224; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 268; Wood's Mayne, Dam. 73.

Reversed and remanded.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

Vladimir CERVENY, Appt.,
v.
CHICAGO DAILY NEWS CO.

(.....III.....)

Falsely publishing that a person is an "anarchist" is libelous.

(October 31, 1891.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cook County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged publication of a libel. Reversed.

The case sufficiently appears in the opinion. Messrs. Jones & Lusk for appellant.

Mr. John J. Knickerbocker for appellee.

Per Curiam:

The demurrer admits all such facts alleged in the declaration as are well pleaded. Gould, Pl. chap. 9, § 4. The declaration here alleges with sufficient legal precision, that the defendant falsely and maliciously published of the plaintiff language, which is literally transcribed in the declaration, charging that the plaintiff is an "anarchist." An "anarchist" is defined by Webster to be: "An anarchy; one who excites revolt, or promotes disorder in a State," and this we assume to be a sufficiently accurate definition of the word. It is, moreover, here alleged that, at the time and place of the publication complained of, it was commonly understood and believed that "the doctrines, opinions, beliefs, teachings, and tenets of said class, party, or sect called 'Anarchists,' as aforesaid, and of the persons composing said class, party, or sect, is that the law and order of society then, and ever since then, and now, existing should be overthrown by revolution and force." It cannot therefore be correctly said that this is no more than charging the plaintiff with being a member of a certain political party; for anarchy, being the enemy of all governments, is necessarily the reverse of a political party, which is always in support of some form of government, and, professedly, of that which is the best. It seems to have been assumed, in the courts below, that it is not libelous to publish, falsely and maliciously, that one entertains principles merely which if carried into practice would be violative of law and destructive of all government and of every right secured by it. It may for the present be conceded that an action would not lie for slander because of the speaking of words, orally only, which would amount to such a charge against an individual; but the rule in regard to libel is different. An action for libel may be sustained for words published which tend to bring the plaintiff into public hatred, contempt, or ridicule, even though the same words spoken would not have been actionable. Folkard, Starkie, Slander & Libel, §§ 155, 156; Newell, Defamation, p. 78 et seq.; Hare & W. Lead. Cas. 181; 3 Am. & Eng. Encyclop. Law, 298, and cases cited in notes. And it would seem so apparent that an individual may be brought into hatred, contempt, or ridicule, within the meaning of the law, by professing vicious, degrading, or absurd principles, and especially by professing them and also confederating with others, alike professing them, to give them effect, that it can need no discussion. The following cases may, however, be referred to as illustrative of the correctness of this view of the law: Hoare v. Silverlock, 12 Q. B. 624; Wakley v. Healey, 7 C. B. 591; Williams v. Karnes, 4 Humph. 9; Duncan v. Brown, 15 B. Mon. 186; Stow v. Converse, 8 Conn. 325, 8 Am. Dec. 189; Giles v. State, 6 Ga. 276.

Since government is the only guaranty we can have for protection in the enjoyment of life, and of all that makes life desirable, it is inevitable that all good citizens must regard those who advocate its destruction either with feelings of hatred or contempt, in the same measure that they may regard them as powerful or impotent to carry out what they advocate. And admitting, therefore, as this demurrer does, that this publication was made falsely and maliciously, as set out in the declaration, we cannot escape the conclusion that it is libelous. The judgments of the appellate and circuit courts are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the circuit court, with directions to that court to overrule the demurrer to the declaration, and allow the defendant to answer over if it shall so desire; and thereupon to proceed de novo.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

NOTE.—For note on libelous publications, see Morey v. Morning Journal Assn. (N. Y.) 9 L. R. A. 621.

I. PUBLIC, OFFICIAL, AND STATUTORY MATTERS.

Elections.

The growing importance of ballot reform gives interest to cases on the new Ballot Acts of the different States. A case deciding among other things several important questions as to the validity of ballots with printing "offsets," grease spots, etc., on the backs also decides that the use of red ink or an indelible pencil substantially complies with an Act requiring erasures, etc., to be made with a lead pencil or common writing ink. It also decided that merely erasing a name is of no effect without substituting another or writing the words "no vote." (Cal.) 761.

Another ballot-law decision holds that the party name on the ballot may be sufficiently shown in a vignette without making the name a separate heading. Also that both tickets made by division of a split convention are to be put on the ballots as presented by the respective committees without any decision by the election commissioners as to their regularity or any addition to the party name thereon. (Mich.) 760.

A ballot reform Act which does not prevent an elector from casting his vote fairly does not interfere with his privileges or immunities, and the requirement that he place a mark opposite the name of the candidate does not impose an educational qualification within a constitutional prohibition. (Tenn.) 183.

Adjournment of an election contest beyond the time limited by statute absolutely discontinues it, even if both parties consent to proceed. (Ind.) 40.

The twenty days limited for an election contest by Indiana Statutes begins to run as soon as the board has convened and organized, although the trial is not begun. Id.

Appropriations.

A provision in an Appropriation Act that the salary for a certain office shall be paid to a certain person named, and none other, and a statute providing a penalty for paying it to any other person than the one named, are absolutely void as attempts to exercise judicial powers 18 L. R. A.

by declaring who is the legal officer entitled to the salary. (Ind.) 177.

The rule that a specified appropriation is necessary in order to draw money from the state treasury is applied in respect to the payment of secretary, stenographer and officers of the Senate during the sitting of the Senate for an impeachment trial. (Kan.) 222.

The sufficiency of an appropriation is considered by an Indiana case which also decides that the sum appropriated for a soldiers' and sailors' monument must all be expended for the structural work and not for incidental expenses. (Ind.) 169.

Harbor Lines.

The power of a city under its charter to establish harbor lines extends to subsequent alterations of the lines as proper occasion may require by the establishment of new ones. (Conn.) 590.

Electric Light Company.

The validity of a license to an electric light company to use streets is upheld in an Indiana case against various objections, and it is also held that notice of proposals for a contract for such lights need not be given unless required by statute where payment is to be made from the corporation treasury. (Ind.) 647.

Municipal Debt.

The distinction sometimes recognized between debts of a county created for necessary purposes or under statutory obligation, and other debts, in respect to the constitutional limitation of indebtedness, is denied by the Supreme Court of Missouri, which holds that such limitation extends to debts of all kinds. (Mo.) 244.

Monopoly of Water Supply.

An exclusive right to supply a city with water for a term of years cannot be given to a water company by the city. (Tex.) 888.

Boards of Health.

The authority of county boards of health in Florida is exhaustively discussed by a case which denies that they have any authority to collect fees for fumigation or disinfection of vessels which are not subject to quarantine. (Fla.) 549.

Railroad Aid Bonds.

False representations to induce persons to sign a petition for an election to issue railway bonds may be shown as a ground of enjoining the issue of the bonds. (Neb.) 811.

Interstate Commerce.

A state statute prohibiting freight trains from running on Sunday between sunrise and sunset except with live-stock or perishable freight, or to complete a trip which can be finished before 9 A. M., is invalid as a regulation of commerce so far as it applies to interstate freight trains. (Va.) 107.

An interesting illustration of a regulation indirectly affecting interstate commerce, but not constituting an unlawful regulation thereof, is a statute prohibiting game birds to be killed for the purpose of conveying them out of the State. (Conn.) 804.

But the Game Laws of a State can give no authority to take carcasses of animals or parts thereof while in the course of transportation away from a common carrier on the ground that the animals have been killed in violation of such laws. (Me.) 83.

It is an unconstitutional regulation of commerce for a state statute to require a carrier to remove a poor person without a settlement in the State whom the carrier has brought into the State. (Me.) 686.

Eminent Domain.

The taking of property without due compensation does not apply to the mere depreciation in value of the lot of an abutting owner who does not own the street, on account of the construction of a railroad in the street where there is no actual invasion or physical interference with his premises or access thereto. (Md.) 126.

The right to appropriate for public use land which has already been appropriated is upheld in case of a water company which has permission to take water from a pond of which the shores have already been appropriated for other public uses where the land is not indispensable to the prior appropriator but is to the water company. (Mass.) 832.

Express legislative authority is not necessary to justify county commissioners in taking a strip of land from a school-house lot for a town-way. (Mass.) 157.

Police Power.

The power of a municipality to regulate the storage of inflammable oils, etc., does not extend to absolute discretion to give and revoke permission to keep and store such oils without any rule for determining the conditions. (Ind.) 587.

The suspension of electric wires over or upon the roofs of buildings, which is shown to be extremely dangerous as liable to cause or prevent the extinguishment of fires, may be prohibited by ordinance and removed by public officers on failure of the owners after notice to remove them. (C. C. N. D. Cal.) 181.

Legislative authority to construct a telegraph line on a public way is not irrevocable and is subject to the police power. (N. Y.) 454.

The police power of a city given by charter may extend to a penal ordinance fixing the weight of loaves of bread. (Mich.) 286.

Municipal power to restrict wooden buildings is discussed in a case which decides, among other things, that such power is not absolute. (Ind.) 481.

Regulation of Railroads.

That a dummy railroad is a railroad within the meaning of statutes regulating the operation of railroads is also decided by the Supreme Court of Tennessee. (Tenn.) 185.

The duty of keeping a lookout upon a locomotive, imposed by the Tennessee statutes on every railroad company, requires the engine as well as the lookout to be at the head of the train. (Tenn.) 864.

Privileges of Citizens.

A statute denying dower to nonresident widows does not violate the constitutional provision as to the privileges and immunities of citizens. (Kan.) 282.

Due Process.

The constitutional requirement of due process of law is violated by a statute providing that a purchase of land at execution sale under an invalid judgment shall be valid unless the purchaser is reimbursed for his bid with interest and costs of defending the title. (N. Y.) 804.

Insolvent Law.

A state insolvent law is valid as to nonresidents so far as to defeat a contract making a prohibited preference of property within the State. (Minn.) 462.

Injunction against Ordinance.

An exception to the rule that an injunction will not lie to prevent the passage of a municipal ordinance is made by a Kentucky decision in favor of an injunction against an ordinance to authorize the illegal transfer of property which might result in irreparable injury. (Ky.) 844.

Courts; Foreign Stockholders.

The rule that a court will not enforce the liability of stockholders under the laws of another State is illustrated in a case where such liability had not been judicially established and the corporation had no place of business in the State, and the parties, though both non-residents, resided in different States and neither of them resided in the State where the corporation was organized. (Mass.) 56.

Naturalization.

The requisites of a court which can have jurisdiction in naturalization proceedings is discussed in a Maine case, which holds that where the judge must keep and authenticate the records, although it has a recorder to keep them when requested by the judge, the court does not have such jurisdiction. (Mass.) 229.

Attorneys.

Attorneys need no appointment by any bar association in order to prefer charges for the disbarment of another attorney for misconduct. (Conn.) 787.

Officers.

An infant may be appointed a deputy sheriff unless otherwise provided by statute although under the State Constitution he cannot be an officer. (N. C.) 721.

The power to make an appointment to an office largely within the control of the Legislature may be given to an administrative officer under a constitutional provision that the appointment shall be made as "prescribed by law." (Ind.) 79.

An office is not necessarily abandoned by accepting an incompatible office. (N. H.) 670.

The rights of municipal officers who have been made trustees by authority of a statute are not vested so as to prevent the Legislature from transferring the trust to other officers. (R. L.) 217.

The omission of venue from a notary public's jurat, which by the authority of many decisions would seem to be fatal, is held not so in Michigan where the notary is a state officer and the record of his appointment is kept in the office of the secretary of state. (Mich.) 556.

The exemption of an officer from liability for public money deposited in a bank which had the confidence of the public, but which afterwards suspended, cannot extend to a case where he placed the money in the bank on a general deposit in violation of law. (Ala.) 659.

Taxes and Assessments.

By a Vermont decision it is held that a corporation of another State "is taxed by such State for all its stock" so as to relieve shareholders in Vermont from a tax on their shares when it is subject to an annual tax assessed according to the amount of its paid-up capital. (Vt.) 166.

A statutory exemption of the capital stock of a corporation when its tangible property is assessed does not prevent taxation of the excess in value of the capital stock over the tangible property. (Ind.) 515.

A deduction of debts cannot be made from the value of national bank stock under a state statute denying the right to such deduction "to any bank, company or corporation exercising banking powers or privileges." (Neb.) 614.

Charging the expense of maintaining a harbor upon those living in its immediate vicinity does not violate a constitutional provision as to equality and uniformity of taxation. (Or.) 533.

The rule that exemption from taxation does not extend to local assessments is applied to a case of express exemption from "all taxation by state or local laws for any purpose whatever." (Ky.) 668.

The exemption of the land of Indians from taxation is upheld in Indiana by force of the Ordinance of 1787. (Ind.) 512.

Special Taxing District.

The creation of a public corporation to maintain a ship canal at the mouth of a navigable river with power to levy taxes therefor is for a municipal purpose. (Or.) 533.

Schools.

The teaching of German in any school on demand of a certain number of patrons cannot be restricted under the Indiana statute to schools of certain grades in a city. (Ind.) 147.

II. CONTRACTUAL AND COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

Statutory Obligation.

A mere statutory obligation to pay money does not create an implied promise to pay it, but the obligation depends on the statute itself. (Conn.) 210.

Public Contracts.

The constitutional provision for letting contracts to the lowest bidder requires that definite plans and specifications must accompany an advertisement for bids. (Ark.) 853.

Conflict of Laws.

A nice distinction between matters relating to the nature and validity of the contract and those relating to the remedy is found in a case holding that the right to show that an indorsement is affected by a collateral oral agreement is governed by the lex loci. (Mass.) 52.

A note and mortgage are governed by the laws of the State in which they are made and in which the money is paid over to the maker by an agent of a nonresident mortgagee, although they are made payable at the mortgagee's residence. (Ala.) 299.

Alteration of Instruments.

The materiality of alterations in instruments is illustrated by a decision that the interlineation of an agreement for attorneys' fees is not material where they are provided for by statute. (Mich.) 313.

Family Settlement.

A family settlement for a distribution of the proceeds of a benefit certificate before anyone 18 L. R. A.

knows to whom the certificate is payable is on a sufficient consideration. (R. I.) 601.

Surety as "Creditor."

The character of a surety on an unmatured obligation as a creditor is discussed in a case holding that he is included among "creditors, purchasers or other persons" who are entitled by statute to take property from a debtor to satisfy their claims. (Tex.) 840.

Bills and Notes.

The substantial exhaustion of the fund for paying Alabama claims makes due a note payable when "the United States pays judgments" in such cases. (Mass.) 258.

An irregular or blank indorsement under the Connecticut statutes, which gives it the effect of an ordinary indorsement, makes the indorser liable as such precisely in the order in which he stands upon the note, although he signs above and before the payee. (Conn.) 806.

Banks.

The doctrine that a bank receiving paper for collection is liable for the default of a correspondent bank to which it sends the paper is applied in a New York case to a default by the insolvency of the correspondent. (N. Y.) 241.

Lack of money in the bank to meet a check will not relieve the holder from his obligation to present it, where the drawer would have provided it or paid it if payment had been insisted on. (N. Y.) 43.

The difference between a savings bank book and an ordinary commercial bank certificate is clearly shown by a Connecticut decision holding that such book is not a negotiable instrument and cannot be made so by contract so as to give an assignee any right against the bank where the book was obtained by fraud. (Conn.) 727.

Active vigilance to detect fraud and forgery is due by a savings bank officer to a depositor on paying the deposit to one presenting the pass-book, although the by-laws provide that the bank will not be responsible for fraud in presenting the bank book and drawing the money, where they also require its presentation by the owner or his agent duly constituted by a writing signed and acknowledged as a condition of payment. (N. Y.) 786.

Carriers.

A novel case as to the right to a free pass guaranteed to a grantor and his family decides that a grandchild of the grantor who has ceased to be a member of his household is not a member of his family. (Mass.) 818.

The much disputed question whether or not a conductor must accept a passenger's word as to his right to ride on a ticket where a mistake has been made by other agents of the carrier is discussed in a Mississippi case, which decides in favor of the passenger. (Miss.) 88.

Accepting too small a fare from a passenger by mistake will not defeat the right to collect the balance of the full fare within a reasonable time after discovering the mistake or to eject the passenger for failure to pay it. (Minn.) 596.

The measure of duty in respect to stopping a train on a dummy railway without regular stopping places is that applicable to street railroads and not to ordinary railroads, and is not fulfilled by merely stopping a reasonable time. (Ala.) 95.

The usage of a carrier requiring a shipper of live-stock to unload it will not prevail as against an express contract of the carrier to perform that duty. (Mass.) 263.

The requirement of notice before removing stock injured on a railroad is held to be substantially complied with where opportunity was given to the station agent at the place of destination to examine the stock, and written notice was sent within four days after to the company's claim agent. (Kan.) 862.

Favoritism between shippers by an agreement to give rebates is pronounced illegal at common law by the supreme court of Vermont in the case of contracts made before the Interstate Commerce Act. (Vt.) 70.

Each backman may be assigned a separate stand at the depot ground of a railroad company, and may be ejected from the stand assigned to another if he refuses to leave it, if no unnecessary force is used. (Mich.) 848.

The liability of a cotton compress company, which has received cotton for compression and storage with agreement to insure it, where the cotton is destroyed by fire, and of a carrier which has made the company its agent to issue bills of lading for cotton received, with various interesting questions as to the liabilities and remedies, are discussed in a Tennessee case. (Tenn.) 518.

Insurance.

The amount for which a creditor may lawfully insure his debtor's life is held by a Pennsylvania decision to be what is sufficient to cover the debt with interest and the cost of the insurance for the period of expectancy of the life insured. (Pa.) 438.

Sun-stroke or heat prostration is held by a very interesting and learned opinion not to be covered by a policy of insurance against injuries through external, violent and accidental means, excluding those due to any disease or bodily infirmity. (C. C. W. D. Mo.) 114.

Death by inhaling deadly gas in a well is held by a Pennsylvania case, following the leading case in 3 L. R. A. 443, to be caused by violent, external and accidental means, and also not to be within the meaning of an exemption clause as to death from "inhalation of gas." (Pa.) 661.

The exception in an insurance policy against liability for death caused by fighting is interpreted to cover death by shooting which followed the fighting and which was the result of it. (Ga.) 888.

The exemption of an accident policy from liability for injury incurred in the violation of law is held by a Vermont decision to extend to an injury by slipping on frozen ground while returning from a hunting expedition or a visit of pleasure on Sunday. (Vt.) 637.

What constitutes voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger is a question discussed in a life insurance case where the insured was killed by a train and must have fallen or been thrown on the track from a platform not intended for passengers. (Mass.) 263.

Voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger is not shown by running toward a train which does not stop to get the mail and stumbling and falling down a bank against the engine. (Ala.) 267.

A lease for five years with an agreement to purchase at the end of the time is not during the time a transfer of title or possession which will defeat a policy allowing occupancy by a tenant. (Cal.) 475.

A chattel mortgage by one partner on firm property makes a change of "interest" if not of title or possession within the meaning of an insurance policy. (Mich.) 684.

The right of the insured to rescind the policy for misrepresentations in the application made by the agent without his knowledge is not defeated by the fact that the insurer would be bound by the policy unless rescinded by him. (Mich.) 349.

Donations; Forfeiture.

The removal of a manufactory which has proved a failure financially is held not to violate the rights of those who made donations to secure its establishment in their community. (Mich.) 696.

Conveyances; Leases.

A novel case concerning a deed to the "heirs" of the grantor's son reserving to the latter a life estate after life estates to the grantor and another holds the deed to be a present grant to the children of such son. (N. Y.) 47.

A reservation in a conveyance of what the grantor has previously sold takes out of the deed all that is included in the boundaries of the land previously sold, although the prior conveyances conveyed only the surface and the grantor still owned the minerals besides timber and a mill site. (Ky.) 289.

A deed for a money consideration on condition that it shall be void if the grantor supports the grantee for life and gives him a decent burial constitutes a mortgage. (Conn.) 452.

The requisite contracting parties do not exist in the case of a mortgage by a person to himself as administrator. (Vt.) 676.

The necessity of parting with all control of deeds in order to make a delivery is shown by a decision holding that there was no delivery where a box containing them with other property was given by the grantor, when expecting to die, to another person to be kept unopened until after the funeral. (Conn.) 64.

An agent's authority to deliver a deed of gift is terminated by the grantor's death. (Utah) 714.

But the death of the lessee does not abrogate a written lease. (Miss.) 593.

A stipulation in a written lease giving the right to cut and use trees on the premises may be waived by parol. (Miss.) 633.

Party Wall Agreement.

Although an oral agreement to pay half the value of a party-wall when it is used is held by the Texas Supreme Court not to be binding on a subsequent purchaser, the sale of the lot is held to be a use of the wall within the meaning of the contract. (Tex.) 50.

Covenant on Sale of Secret.

A covenant by one selling a business that she, her father, husband and brother-in-law will refrain from communicating a secret recipe used in the business to anyone but the buyer, and from using trade-marks connected with the business under a penalty of $5,000 named as stipulated damages in case of a violation of the covenant within five years, does not limit her liability for such damages to her own personal violation of the covenant, but extends it to a violation by any of the persons named. (N. Y.) 652.

Sales.

A somewhat peculiar case in which the obligation to make the first annual payment on a contract is held optional is one for the purchase of patents with a cash payment and an agreement for annual payments for fourteen years, amounting to $250,000 or $100,000 to be paid within two years providing that failure to make any payment shall make the contract void. (Mass.) 690.

The good-will and trade-marks of an insolvent manufacturing company are part of its property which may pass at an assignee's sale of the mills, machinery, etc. (Md.) 880.

Private representations made before a public auction may constitute a warranty. (Vt.) 678.

It may be shown that by usage the sellers of tobacco by samples undertake to guarantee the truth of statements on tags attached to the samples. (Pa.) 438.

The price fixed by a combination of manufacturers for their own purposes will not govern as to the price to be paid by a purchaser from one of them for goods ordered without mentioning the price. (Mich.) 770.

A contract for ice of a described quality and thickness is an express warranty that it shall be of that quality and thickness when delivered, and the warranty is not waived by receiving, storing and attempting to dispose of the ice. (Me.) 224.

Statute of Frauds.

The Statute of Frauds as to a contract for more than one year does not apply to a parol agreement by one having a lease of a farm for one year beginning at a future day to use the ice in an ice-house thereon without charge if he would refill it so as to leave it filled when he surrendered possession. (Conn.) 646.

The Statute of Frauds as to a promise to pay the debt of another applies to a verbal promise by the administrator of a mortgagee to pay taxes against the mortgagor if the collector will not levy on the mortgaged property, on which he has no lien. (Conn.) 643.

Although an agreement to acquire real estate converted into money and divide the proceeds is within the Statute of Frauds, a trust to pay over the proceeds will arise where the contract has been executed, except as to such payment. (Mich.) 621.

Honesty of Employé.

The breach of the implied condition that an employé will serve his employer honestly by embezzling funds during every month he was employed by a contract which was entire for each month prevents any recovery for wages. (Minn.) 72.

III. CORPORATIONS AND ASSOCIATIONS.

A very important case as to the status of foreign corporations holds that the fact that the incorporators are all residents of the State, and the principal place of business is in the State, will not make their incorporation in another State invalid where no fraud or evasion of the laws of the State of incorporation is shown. (N. Y.) 854.

False statements in a certificate filed by a foreign corporation in order to be permitted to do business will not render the consignees liable for deceit to one who suffers loss by giving credit to the corporation. (Mass.) 783.

The question whether a bank was a corporation or a partnership was held to be a question for the jury, where there was evidence of or ganization under an alleged charter, the holding of stock and receipt of dividends thereon. (Pa.) 870.

The powers of a committee of a corporation appointed to make a contract may be exercised by a majority of the committee in the absence of the other members. (Mass.) 559.

The estoppel of stockholders as to the corporate character of their company, has a somewhat striking illustration in a Pennsylvania case in which subscribers to companies never completely organized but merged in a new company were held estopped as against creditors of the latter to deny the legality of the merger or the corporate character of any or all of the companies. (Pa.) 779.

(DOMESTIC RELATIONS; PERSONAL CAPACITY—TORTS; NEGLIGENCE, INJURIES; NUISANCES.)

A corporation is not liable for the forgery by its president of the secretary's signature to certificates of stock taken in private and personal transactions with him, although it had allowed him to continue in office and have access to its certificate book and seal after he had violated his agreement to pledge his own shares to his associates by pledging them to another. (Mass.) 198.

The Minnesota law as to a union depot in the city of St. Paul is construed to require the railroad companies owning stock therein to surrender some if necessary in order to allow a new company whose road enters the city to become a member of the corporation. (Minn.) 415.

The reasonableness of tolls charged by a company, so long as within the limits fixed by statute, cannot be questioned, and the right to collect tolls cannot be questioned by denying the necessity of the franchise or the perfection of the improvements made by the corporation. (Pa.) 427.

Under the retaliatory feature of the Maryland statute as to foreign insurance companies, if a Maryland company is refused a license in another State on the ground of discretion, companies of that State may be excluded from Maryland on the same ground although the Maryland statutes do not in terms authorize it. (Md.) 584.

The law of a benefit society making the decision as to a death claim by its committee final, and denying any appeal to the courts, is not invalid. (Mich.) 625.

The rule that church property cannot be diverted from the purposes for which it was given applies in the case of a Baptist church, although independent in government, where a majority attempt to use it in teaching doctrines contrary to those of the Baptist denomination. (Iowa) 198.

IV. DOMESTIC RELATIONS; PERSONAL STATUS OR CAPACITY.

A divorce will not be denied to a man in case of his wife's adultery by reason of the fact that he married her while under arrest on bastardy process merely to have the child born in wedlock and on an agreement with her that they should never live together, which they have kept. (Mass.) 848.

Resumption of marital duties by a wife who had voluntarily left her husband is no consideration for the revocation of a valid antenuptial contract. (Pa.) 581.

The right of women to be admitted to the bar on equal terms with men is affirmed by a Colorado decision in the absence of statutory or constitutional provision to the contrary. (Colo.) 538.

A marriage which is void because one of the parties has no right to marry cannot legitimate a child under a statute providing for legitimation by marriage. (Mass.) 275.

The meaning of the word "relative," in the Maine statute giving to the descendants the share of a relative named as devisee, who dies before the testator, is restricted to blood relations and does not extend to relatives by marriage. (Me.) 37.

The presumption as to care and prudence of a child is that it was such as was usual for those of his age and experience, but the presumption is not conclusive. (Pa.) 874.

The protection of infants' property is illustrated by a case in which a judicial sale to a relative, who was virtually their guardian, was set aside although the sale was in good faith and managed by a stranger appointed curator of the estate. (Ark.) 490.

The distinction between residence and domicile is made in the case of a child not formally adopted but living as a member of the family of a resident of a school district, and the child is held to be a resident of the district for school purposes. (Conn.) 161.

Unsoundness of mind requiring a guardian is something more than a liability to exercise "ordinary care and prudence" in managing and taking care of one's property. (Iowa) 757.

V. FIDUCIARIES AND REPRESENTATIVES.

The bond on granting ancillary administration may be made twice the value of the personal estate in the State, although the language of N. Y. Code Civ. Proc., § 2699, would seem to limit it to twice the amount of the claims of resident creditors. (N. Y.) 104.

The ratification of unauthorized acts extends to negligence of one who was not at the time acting in the employment of the person ratifying. (Mass.) 219.

VI. TORTS; NEGLIGENCE; INJURIES; NUISANCES.

Breach of Public Duty.

The rule that a breach of public duty will create a liability to a person injured in consequence is applied to the case of a street railroad company which failed to use the extra degree of care required by a valid ordinance. (Mo.) 74.

The obligation of a sleeping car company to passengers occupying berths is illustrated by a decision that the passengers can recover for mistake in awakening them and causing them 18 L. R. A.

to get off at the wrong place, where they are injured by the consequent exposure. (Tex.) 215.

Malicious Prosecution.

That the malicious prosecution of a civil suit without probable cause is actionable although defendant is not arrested or his property attached is affirmed as the better doctrine by the Supreme Court of Missouri. (Mo.) 59.

Libel and Slander.

Words which merely impute a criminal intention are not within the rule which makes a charge of crime actionable. (R. I.) 184.

The words "Bad Debt Collecting Agency," printed in large bold type on envelopes mailed to a debtor, especially when mailed in care of his employers, constitute a criminal libel. (Mo.) 419.

Falsely publishing that a person is an "anarchist" is libelous. (Ill.) 864.

The privilege of discussing the character and fitness of a candidate for office does not extend to false statements. (Mo.) 59.

The distinction between the privilege, in the case of libel, as to servants, and that in case of public persons, is clearly brought out in a Massachusetts decision which holds that false statements of fact as to public persons are not privileged, although free and open comment and criticism are, and that reasonable cause to believe the truth of the charge is no defense to a libel, also that damages therefor cannot be enhanced by republication of the libel by others even if it was a probable consequence. (Mass.) 91.

The rule as to privileged communications in libel cases applies to a communication by the cashier of a bank to a stockholder as to the solvency of a surety on a bond to the bank. (N. J.) 655.

Slander of Title.

A case as to slander of title decides that no action therefor can be based on statements which cause the breach by a third person of a valid contract because there is a remedy on the contract. (Cal.) 707.

Poisoning Animals.

Evidence of the market value of dogs is not necessary to sustain a judgment for damages for poisoning them, where there is proof of their usefulness and services from which the jury can infer value. (Tex.) 272.

Conversion.

The sale of stolen stock by a stock broker, who purchased it from the thief in good faith, renders him liable to the owner for conversion. (Cal.) 605.

Negligence Generally.

The liability of a railroad company for injury to a boy by its turn-table left unlocked near a highway is denied by a Massachusetts decision reviewing conflicting authorities. (Mass.) 248.

A common hand-car is not such a dangerous agency that a railroad company is liable for leaving it unlocked and unguarded near a railroad track at a distance from any habitation, where a boy, who with others had put it on the track, was run over and killed by it. (Utah) 765.

Want of care in making an excavation whereby a building on adjoining land is damaged, is presumed where no notice was given to the owner. (N. J.) 569.

The weight which may properly be driven upon a bridge is discussed in an Indiana case holding that it is not negligence as matter of law to drive upon a bridge with a traction steam engine, water tank and threshing machine. (Ind.) 851.

Snow on the deck of a ferry-boat during a snow-storm, on which a passenger slips and falls, raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier. (Pa.) 366.

The liability of a steamship company for negligence of a physician whom it is required by law to carry is denied in a case in which there were charges of negligence and assault by the physician in vaccinating passengers. (Mass.) 329.

The rule that a telegraph company cannot exempt itself by stipulation from liability for negligence is reaffirmed by a Utah decision. (Utah) 510.

The doctrine of license by acquiescence in the use of a railway crossing is held not to extend to a case of mere knowledge by the company that numerous persons are in the habit of crawling under its cars while standing on the tracks in its yard. (Ga.) 634.

Voluntary Risk.

Voluntarily risking one's life or safety to save another is held by an Ohio decision, following the humane doctrine of several other courts, not to constitute contributory negligence. (Ohio) 190.

Injuries to Servants.

The assumption of risk by continuing to work near dangerous machinery after a promise to enclose it is discussed by a Michigan case reviewing many authorities. (Mich.) 728.

A loom fixer in a cotton mill, whose duty it is to look after looms and keep them in repair, is not the fellow servant of the weavers in respect to his negligence as to the looms. (N. H.) 824.

A railroad employé's disobedience of a rule requiring him to examine and know the kind and condition of coupling apparatus before attempting to couple cars, where sufficient time to make it is given, will defeat his right to recover for injuries from defective couplings. (N. Dak.) 465.

The rule as to the assumption of negligence by an employé is applied in the case of a brakeman to charge him with the risk of hanging from the side of a car to look under it in order to learn what made stones fly therefrom, and the company is not liable for negligence in making wing fences at cattle-guards so near the track as to strike him while hanging in that position where no such accident had ever been anticipated. (Iowa) 817.

Nuisance.

The exemption of a municipal corporation from liability for injuries by work done for a public benefit does not extend to a nuisance by the encroachment and overhanging of the premises of a private owner where a retaining wall is pushed over by filling up a school yard above its natural level. (Mass.) 841.

Another case concerning nuisances holds that a slaughter-house is not necessarily a nuisance in a neighborhood, and that the noise of pigs kept in confinement for slaughter does not make it so. (Mich.) 331.

VII. PROPERTY RIGHTS; LIENS; GIFTS; WILLS.

Water Rights.

The right to erect barriers against the overflow of a river in time of floods, where it will damage lands on the opposite bank by increasing their overflow or deflecting the river, is denied by a decision which exhaustively reviews the cases on the subject, both English and American. In this case the embankment was built by a railroad company. (Ga.) 894.

The right of the owner of land bordering on a stream to use it as a pasture in a reasonable way is not affected by the fact that the waters are thereby made unfit for use, although the water-works of an incorporated company have been established lower down to supply the public with water from that stream. (Md.) 117.

No riparian rights are acquired by a purchaser of lots according to a plat which shows the boundary by specified measurements and an alley on other lots between that and the water. (Wash.) 142.

The right as to floatage of logs on streams is exhaustively discussed in a New Hampshire case, which is based on the rule that dams for manufacturing purposes must not interfere with public rights to floatage. (N. H.) 826.

The doctrine that riparian rights may be severed from the ownership of the shore land is again maintained by a Minnesota decision. (Minn.) 411.

Another case involving rights in the great ponds of Massachusetts, which have been discussed in several earlier cases in this series of Reports, sustains the right of private owners to prevent drawing water therefrom. (Mass.) 255.

Room in Building.

The rights of a grantee of a single room in a building, with an easement for ingress and egress, are extinguished by a destruction of the greater part of the building, whereby the identity of the room is destroyed. (Or.) 158.

Fee in Road-bed.

The fee in the whole road-bed passes by a deed of land bounded along a road which is laid out entirely on the grantor's own land but on the margin thereof. (N. Y.) 611.

Condition.

A conveyance for the use of a county in consideration of establishing a county seat at the place is not on a condition subsequent that the county seat remain there. (Ind.) 178.

Reservation.

A reservation of a right to flood lands conveyed by a railroad company will not be implied by the fact that a faulty embankment was already constructed. (Tex.) 657.

Entireties.

That an absolute divorce changes a tenancy by entirety into a tenancy in common without survivorship is decided by the New York Court of Appeals following decisions in Illinois, Indiana and Tennessee against a contrary decision in Michigan. (N. Y.) 325.

Dower.

The doctrine that a wife's inchoate right of dower is not cut off by a sale for taxes, which 18 L. R. A.

is laid down in 5 L. R. A. 821, by the Supreme Court of South Carolina, is again declared by the Supreme Court of Missouri without reference to that decision. (Mo.) 441.

Wife's Right on Partition.

The right of a married woman to the proceeds on partition sale of her share of lands vested in her by the Delaware Married Woman's Acts, is held to be absolute. (Del.) 346.

Levy.

The right of an officer forcibly to take personal property from its owner after levy against a third person is denied in a Wisconsin case reviewing conflicting decisions on the question. (Wis.) 487.

The exemption from execution of personal property extends to the proceeds of insurance thereon. (Iowa) 719.

Homestead.

The right to a continuance of a homestead exemption after the loss of all one's family is sustained in accordance with the weight of authority by a Kentucky decision. (Ky.) 743.

Mines.

The rights of the grantee in fee of coal under the surface extend to the use of a tunnel through the coal for the removal of other coal from adjacent lands. (Pa.) 627.

Good-will and Trade-marks.

The transfer of the good-will and trade-marks not personal is accomplished by the sale of the plant of an insolvent company by an assignee for creditors, under an advertisement describing the property as "old established and valuable cotton-duck mills." (Md.) 880.

A trade union is held by a decision similar to that in 3 L. R. A. 125, not to be entitled to a trade-mark where it is neither a manufacturer, dealer nor trader. (Pa.) 377.

Equity will not protect a non-union trade-mark label, the purpose of which is to discriminate between union and non-union labor and coerce laborers into joining the union by denouncing all non-union goods as "inferior, rat-shop, cooley, prison or filthy tenement-house workmanship." (Pa.) 377.

The right to a trade-mark does not extend to the shape of a bottle or of a box in which bottles are packed, or in the use on such a bottle of a cap label previously used by others nor in the combination of such label and bottle. (Pa.) 348.

Fraud in Transfers.

A conveyance by an insolvent to his daughter in consideration of her marriage is not fraudulent as to creditors if made without intent to defraud. (Cal.) 711.

The necessity of a fraudulent intent in order to make a conveyance fraudulent as to creditors is extensively discussed by a California decision, which holds that such intent must be found. (Cal.) 576.

An innocent purchaser of personal property from one who has obtained possession of it by fraud without obtaining title acquires no title by the purchase. (Iowa) 717.

Pledge.

A pledge to secure a note and "any other note or claim" held against the maker includes claims against the firm of which he is a member. (Mass.) 815.

Liens.

A vendor on the sale of land by contract has a lien as security for a purchase-money note and can transfer it to an assignee of the note. (Cal.) 187.

Consent to the erection of buildings is shown so as to render the vendor's interest subject to a mechanics' lien, where in the contract of sale it is provided that the vendee shall erect the buildings within a specified time, although it also provides that any mechanics' liens shall be subsequent to those of the vendor. (N. Y.) 701.

Mortgages.

The rights of the mortgagee in possession are not affected by the fact that his right of action is barred. (Cal.) 487.

An assignment for creditors is held by the Ohio supreme court to cut off a mortgage on real property which is not yet deposited for record, and to do so as soon as it is delivered to the probate court, although it is not itself filed for record. This decision is based on the Ohio statute, which, although not declaring that unrecorded mortgages are void as to creditors, says they shall take effect from the time they are delivered for record. (Ohio) 235.

There is no merger of a mortgage in the equity of redemption acquired by the mortgagee where while he owns it another person has the mortgage as collateral. (N. H.) 294.

The law as to recording chattel mortgages is illustrated by a decision that a mortgage taken after a prior mortgage on a stock of goods had been recorded to secure the purchase price of goods sold to the mortgagor after the prior mortgage was made but before it was recorded is superior to the first mortgage, where the second mortgagee first takes possession of the goods under his mortgage. (Mich.) 388.

A mortgagor's removal of personal property to another State, where it is seized and sold by his creditors on attachment, cannot affect the rights of the mortgagee whose mortgage was duly recorded in the State where the parties resided. (N. C.) 740.

Dedication.

The validity of a dedication of land for a public park and of an acceptance thereof is discussed in a case which holds that one who has carefully investigated the facts cannot become a bona fide purchaser as against the dedication although he purchases after reaching a conclusion that is erroneous. (Mass.) 251.

Gift.

A gift of the use of the profits of a plantation to a certain person, but not to be bound for his debts other than decent and comfortable support, is held not to be within the reach of his creditors. (Va.) 212.

Money expended by a man while living with his married daughter on her premises without any expectation of payment, and to make improvements for his own use, cannot be charged against her estate for the benefit of his creditors after his death. (Vt.) 640.

Wills.

What the court calls a close case is one in which it decides that a will directing that testator's wife "shall have and hold the property" where he resides gives her the fee which is not cut down by a subsequent clause directing that she shall have the "sole control of the same during her lifetime." (Pa.) 359.

An obligatory trust is not created by a gift to testator's wife of all his estate requesting her to leave what she does not require for her support by her will to other persons named. (Del.) 563.

The time when legacies vest is discussed in a case deciding that it is at the death of the testator where an estate converted into money is to be given in equal shares among certain children and if either dies before payment his share is to be divided between the survivors. (Pa.) 360.

VIII. CIVIL REMEDIES; RULES AND PRINCIPLES.

Right of Action.

A purchaser of premises after an elevated railroad has been built, which makes a continuing trespass upon easements of light, air and access, has a right of action regardless of the amount paid by him, and his recovery in lieu of an injunction must be the difference in values with and without the road. (N. Y.) 401.

An action for injury to lands without the State cannot be maintained in a state court if no part of the act which caused the injury was performed within the State. (Tex.) 542.

A difference in the statutes as to the right of action for negligence causing death is not sufficient to prevent action in a State other than that where the injury occurred where the difference is merely as to the person designated to bring the action or as to the amount of recovery. (N. Y.) 458.

A suit by a taxpayer to set aside a contract by a city must be based on injury to himself as a taxpayer. (Tex.) 383.

Failure of a bailee to procure insurance as agreed by him will not make him liable if the bailor without relying on the agreement has himself procured sufficient insurance. (Tenn.) 518.

Remedy of Indian.

The right of an Indian to sue in a state court is affirmed in a Texas case which decides that he may lawfully own personal property and assign a claim for damages for its wrongful destruction. (Tex.) 542.

Election of Remedy.

Election of remedies is not made by attachment and bill in chancery based on fraud in procuring credit so as to defeat an action on subsequently maturing notes for purchase money as the remedies are not inconsistent. (N. Y.) 91.

An action to set aside an assignment for creditors as fraudulent is not such an election of remedies as will debar the creditors from sharing in a distribution under the assignment pending the suit. (N. Y.) 472.

The fact that a negotiable note given for the purchase price of a chattel has gone to protest and is unpaid will not defeat an action for breach of warranty. (Neb.) 140.

The remedy on an injunction bond is not exclusive of the common-law action of covenant, where the injunction has operated as a breach of covenant. (Va.) 811.

When Barred.

A suit to restrain a continuous trespass is not barred so long as the remedy at law for injuries is not barred and the plaintiff retains the legal title. (N. Y.) 788.

The doctrine that mere laches of plaintiff, unaccompanied by circumstances amounting to an estoppel, will not bar an equitable remedy to enforce a legal right, is applied where plaintiff delayed eleven years before suing to restrain a continuous trespass. (N. Y.) 788.

Revival of a judgment without jurisdiction of the defendant after he has left the State will not affect the running of the Statute of Limitations in another State. (Neb.) 565.

Injunction.

A property owner may enjoin the rebuilding in violation of a valid ordinance of a wooden building partially destroyed by fire although it would not be a nuisance per se if it would work special and irreparable damage to him. (Ind.) 481.

An injunction to prevent the removal of buildings placed by a vendee on land held under a contract for which he has paid a large share of the purchase money will not be granted if the vendor's security will not be impaired by the removal. (Cal.) 680.

Jury.

The jury are final judges of the law as well as of the facts in a prosecution for criminal libel under Mo. Const., art. 2, § 14, although the judge should assist and inform them what the law is. (Mo.) 419.

The amount to be paid for the joint use of a street railway track in the hands of a receiver may be determined by the court on a petition where the statutes give the right to such use on payment of one half the cost of construction, and there is no right to a jury on the ground that it involves the exercise of the right of eminent domain. (Cal.) 754.

Process.

The residence of a family after the head of it has established himself in another State intending to make that his permanent residence is no longer "his usual place of residence" at which process may be served by leaving a copy with a member of the family. (Iowa) 785.

Service of summons on "Jack Veasey" is held sufficient to sustain a judgment by default against A. J. Veasey. (Ala.) 541.

Evidence.

An interesting construction of one of the modern statutes concerning testimony as to transactions with deceased persons is that of the Michigan Supreme Court, holding that the words "opposite party" in a statute excluding the testimony of such party to matters equally within the knowledge of a deceased person in a suit by the latter's heirs, representatives, etc., mean the opposite party in interest, and include an interested person who is not a party on the record, and exclude an executor who has no personal interest. (Mich.) 83.

The privilege of women under the Mississippi Code to testify by deposition is discussed in a case which denies that the deposition can be read where the other party dies before trial, even if the substituted party is also a woman and might testify by deposition. (Miss.) 632.

The question as to permitting an expert witness to state directly his opinion as to the amount of damages to property is extensively discussed by a New York case which decides it in the negative. (N. Y.) 499.

Apparently ambiguous marks on tobacco tags attached to samples may be explained by parol. (Pa.) 488.

An Illinois decision holds that parol evidence is admissible to show the liability assumed by a stranger which places his name on the back of a promissory note. (Ill.) 649.

Possession under a specific legacy is presumed to be with the assent of the executors. (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 567.

Open and notorious facts which one with honest motives would have learned may be shown on the question of malice in a prosecution. (Minn.) 463.

Damages.

The denial of any damages for breach of a covenant of warranty is made by a South Carolina decision where the consideration of the covenant was love and affection and the recovery for the breach of covenants of warranty under the statute was limited to the purchase money paid with interest. (S. C.) 723.

The amount to be paid for property taken for public uses is discussed in a case holding that the value, and not the cost of a toll-bridge taken by the county, is the amount to be paid. (Pa.) 431.

The use of a house as a place of prostitution does not affect the liability for depreciation of its value from the construction and operation of an elevated railroad in the street in front of it. (N. Y.) 103.

The doctrine of liquidated damages is well discussed and illustrated in a Kansas case holding the sum of $500 fixed as damages for failure to perform a contract, the cost of which would not exceed $100, to be a penalty. (Kan.) 671.

In assessing damages for personal injury jurors should not have their attention drawn to the price for which they would be willing to suffer the injury. (Pa.) 374.

Punitive damages are recoverable for willfully delivering at the wrong landing goods marked for delivery at a private landing. (Miss.) 600.

The authorities on the question of damages for mental suffering are reviewed in a Mississippi decision which denies such a recovery for negligent failure to deliver a telegram. (Miss.) 859.

Subrogation.

The right of subrogation on payment of prior liens extends to one who has been induced by fraud to take a mortgage in good faith from one without legal capacity to make it. (Ind.) 619.

Set-off.

A surety sued jointly with his principal may offset his individual claim against the creditor where both creditor and principal are insolvent. (N. Dak.) 283.

Judgments.

The validity and effect of judgments entered on warrants of attorney is discussed in a New York case holding such judgments as valid in all other States as in the State where they are entered, and also that they may be entered on a note containing such a warrant before its maturity. (N. Y.) 796.

Bribing a witness is not ground for vacating a decree. (Cal.) 336.

The right to set aside a judgment taken in the absence of defendant's attorney is upheld where the absence was due to sickness and the client was also absent on account of an announcement by the judge that the cases of that attorney would not be taken up. (Ga.) 689.

Appeal.

The right to appeal as a party "aggrieved" is held not to extend to executors where the judgment affects only the rights of claimants of the property of the decedent as between themselves. (N. Y.) 745.

Estoppel.

Representations to a commercial agency respecting one's business, communicated to its patrons, estop him as against the latter to deny their truth. (Minn.) 270.

An estoppel against setting up adverse possession is held not created against a defendant in ejectment by the fact that his grantor after setting up the same defense in a prior action had settled it by buying plaintiff's title and giving his notes for the purchase money, which have not been paid. (N. Y.) 206.

Ejectment.

The remedy of ejectment does not extend to the case of constructing a sewer upon land without taking possession of it. (Mich.) 664.

Replevin.

The rule that replevin will not lie for goods in custody of the law is applied in the case of goods held by a sheriff in proceedings to forfeit them, although they are in the original packages in which they were brought from another State and the plaintiff legally entitled to have them restored to him. (Iowa) 408.

Quieting Title.

The rights of an execution purchaser in respect to a prior fraudulent conveyance are discussed in a case holding that his title may be quieted against it where the statute authorized the levy notwithstanding the conveyance. (Mich.) 693.

IX. CRIMINAL LAW AND PRACTICE.

A change of procedure from indictment to information is not ex post facto as to offenses already committed. (Wyo.) 748.

Registering a qualified voter without his appearing in person as required by law is held not to be punishable as a felony under the Kansas statute when done without fraudulent intent. (Kan.) 607.

Being intoxicated and yelling on the public streets in such a manner as to disturb the good order and tranquillity is a breach of the peace. (Mich.) 163.

An officer has no right to make an arrest without a warrant for breach of the peace by yelling, etc., committed when he was not in sight although he heard it. Id.

The right of an officer to take money from a person under arrest is discussed in an Alabama case which decides that it can be taken only when there is reasonable ground to believe that the money is connected with the crime, or may be useful on the trial. (Ala.) 120.

One convicted of intoxication can constitutionally be required to disclose when, where, how, and from whom he obtained the intoxicating liquor. (Conn.) 66.

The illegal purpose of a person from whom money is obtained by false pretenses is no defense to an indictment against the person thus obtaining it. (Colo.) 752.

The agent of a common carrier is held liable for aiding and abetting in bringing intoxicating liquors into a city to be sold illegally, where he habitually delivered them, although he had nothing to do with ordering them, or bringing them to the city. (Mass.) 195.

The time of absence from jail through an unauthorized act of the sheriff under a sentence to pay a fine or be imprisoned cannot be counted in estimating the period of imprisonment. (Cal.) 574.

(Separate Index to Notes precedes this.)

ACCOMPLICES. See CRIMINAL LAW, NOTES AND BRIEFS.

ACCOUNT.

An attorney may properly include in one item of his account sued on his compensation for writing two letters to different persons upon the same subject-matter. Powers v. Manning (Mass.) 258

ACTION OR SUIT. See also COURTS, 7.

1. One in actual, peaceable, and exclusive possession of personal property may maintain an action for its destruction by the negligence of a mere wrongdoer. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Cullers (Tex.) 542

2. Mere possession of buildings on land, to which plaintiff has no title or right of possession, is insufficient to support an action for their wrongful destruction,—especially in the absence of evidence that they were not attached to the land, or of any right to remove them. Id.

3. Continuing trespasses by an elevated-railroad company on easements appurtenant to certain premises give a right of action to the purchaser of the premises, without regard to the price paid by him. Pappenheim v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. (N. Y.) 401

4. A contract by a vendor with a third person to pay a judgment gives no right of action in favor of a vendee by quitclaim who has been compelled to pay it to protect his land. McClure v. Melton (S. C.) 723

5. Owners of separate and distinct tenements may unite in an action to restrain the rebuilding, in violation of a city ordinance, of a structure partially destroyed by fire, the injury from which will affect all of them alike. Mount Vernon First Nat. Bank v. Sarlls (Ind.) 481

6. Bringing and prosecuting an action to set aside as fraudulent his debtor's assignment for the benefit of creditors is not such an election of remedies as will debar a creditor from sharing in a distribution of the assigned estate made pending such suit. Mills v. Parkhurst (N. Y.) 472

7. An election of remedies is not made by attachment and bill in chancery based on fraud in procuring credit on a purchase by an insolvent corporation, so as to defeat an action on subsequently maturing purchase-money notes, as the remedies are not inconsistent, being in each instance for the recovery of the price. Crossman v. Universal Rubber Co. (N. Y.) 91

8. A carrier liable for the destruction of cotton in the hands of a compress company as its agent is a necessary party to an action by the owner of the cotton to recover from the company for its breach of a contract with the carrier to procure insurance on the cotton. Deming v. Merchants Cotton-Press & S. Co. (Tenn.) 518

9. To prevent abatement of an action on purchase-money notes it may be shown that a prior attachment and a bill in chancery for the recovery of the debt had been respectively discontinued and unproductive. Crossman v. Universal Rubber Co. (N. Y.) 91

10. A disability of the plaintiff to sue is waived by failure to file a plea in abatement or to take a special exception. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Cullers (Tex.) 542

11. Administration in one county will not prevent an administrator of a stockholder from being joined as defendant in another county, in a suit in equity to enforce the liability of stockholders. Hamilton v. Jackson (Pa.) 779

ALABAMA CLAIMS.

The fees of a commissioner of the Court of Commissioners of Alabama Claims are not regulated by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 847, relating to commissioners' fees. Powers v. Manning (Mass.) 258

ALIENS.

1. The word "citizens," as used in the Kansas Bill of Rights, § 17, prior to the amendment of 1888, prohibiting any distinction between citizens and aliens in reference to the purchase, enjoyment, or descent of property, means citizens of Kansas; and the word "aliens" means persons born out of the United States and not naturalized. Buffington v. Grosvenor (Kan.) 282

2. A statute which denies a widow any right in land conveyed by her husband, if she was not then and never had been a resident of the State, does not make any distinction "between citizens and aliens," within the meaning of the Kansas Bill of Rights, § 17, as it stood prior to 1888. Buffington v. Grosvenor (Kan.) 282

ALTERATION OF INSTRUMENTS.

1. The interlineation of an agreement to pay attorneys' fees, in that clause of a bond to secure an agent's possible indebtedness to his principal, in which the obligors bind themselves to pay the penalty, which has been fixed at a definite amount, is not a material alteration which will avoid the bond, under a statute providing that judgment in case of breach shall be entered for the penalty and execution issued for the damages assessed by the jury, not to exceed the penalty, as it cannot affect the judgment or amount of damages assessed. White Sewing-Mach. Co. v. Dakin (Mich.) 313

2. Alteration of a bond after execution, by an agent of the obligee without authority, express or implied, will not avoid it. Id.

Evidence of the market value of dogs is not necessary to sustain a judgment for damages for poisoning them, where there is proof of their usefulness and services from which the jury can infer value. Heiligmann v. Rose (Tex.) 272

APPEAL AND ERROR. See also HEALTH, 2.

1. The right to appeal as a party "aggrieved" does not extend to executors who have obtained a judgment construing a will as to which of two parties is entitled to a certain bequest, where the alleged claimants acquiesce in the decision. Bryant v. Thompson (N. Y.) 745

2. A plaintiff whose time to redeem from a mortgage as allowed by the court has expired pending an appeal by defendant which prevented the redemption will be allowed by the appellate court the same time after entry of final judgment upon the trial. Schlawig v. De Peyster (Iowa) 785

3. A finding by the trial court upon a distinct issue of fact whether or not the assignee of a savings bank pass-book is a bona fide holder is conclusive. McCaskill v. Connecticut Sav. Bank (Conn.) 787

4. On an appeal involving the right of a commissioner appointed to take testimony by the Commissioners of Alabama Claims to make a special contract as to fees, instructions issued by the Court of Commissioners cannot be received when not put in evidence on the trial. Powers v. Manning (Mass.) 258

5. Absence of evidence to support a justice's judgment cannot be presumed where no attempt to return the evidence was made, but the return states that the judgment was rendered after listening to the testimony, and after due deliberation. Sullivan v. Hall (Mich.) 556

6. On appeal by defendant, plaintiff cannot ask that the decree be changed or altered in the appellate court. Schlawig v. De Peyster (Iowa) 785

7. A conviction for resisting an officer in arresting the defendant for breach of the peace without a warrant cannot be sustained on appeal by the claim that defendant was liable to arrest for being intoxicated in a public street. People v. Johnson (Mich.) 163

8. The admission of incompetent evidence will not be held to be nonprejudicial to defendant in an action to enjoin an elevated-railroad company from operating its road until it pays the damage done to an abutting-property owner, because the company is not bound to pay the ascertained damages to acquire the easement, but may submit to the injunction and proceed to acquire the right by eminent domain. Roberts v. New York Elev. R. Co. (N. Y.) 499

9. The admission of incompetent declarations of an employé of a railroad company, in an action against it for damages for injuries to stock transported by it, is immaterial error where the facts stated by such employé are not in controversy. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Temple (Kan.) 363

10. An instruction which fails to present separately the elements of actual and exemplary damages, but limits the amount of recovery, is not prejudicial if the verdict is for less than the jury could properly find. Heiligmann v. Rose (Tex.) 272

11. Error in charging on the rule of contributory negligence is not prejudicial to defendant where there is no evidence of plaintiff's negligence. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Smith (Tex.) 215

12. A judgment will not be reversed for the error of the court in directing a verdict for plaintiff when the case should have been submitted to the jury because the right of recovery depended on oral testimony, where no interest of defendant would be subserved by reversal, if the assignments of error do not contain the language of the court in totidem verbis, and the question is not argued for appellant. Genesee Fork Imp. Co. v. Ives (Pa.) 427

APPROPRIATIONS.

1. A provision in an appropriation Act, that the salary for a certain office shall be paid to a certain person named, and none other, and a statute providing a penalty for paying it to any other person than the one named, are absolutely void as attempts to exercise judicial powers by declaring who is the legal officer entitled to the salary. State, Worrell, v. Carr (Ind.) 177

2. An appropriation of a certain sum for a state soldiers' and sailors' monument, by an Act requiring bonds from commissioners that the cost shall not exceed that sum including donations and contributions, can be used only for the structural work of the monument, and not to pay the compensation and expenses of commissioners, secretary, and architect, or expenses of advertising for and procuring the design, or for other incidental expenses authorized by the Act. Henderson v. State Soldiers & S. Monument Comrs. (Ind.) 169

8. A sufficient appropriation is made by an Act expressly authorizing expenses to be incurred, and directing that they shall be paid, when it is taken in connection with the general statute authorizing the auditor of the State to "draw warrants on the treasurer for all moneys directed by law to be paid," etc. Id.

4. Money appropriated for the pay of members of the Legislature, its officers and clerks, cannot be used to pay the expense of an impeachment trial. Henderson v. Hovey (Kan.) 222

5. Under a statute appropriating for the expenses of an impeachment trial specific sums for the pay of members of the Senate, and for the compensation of the secretary, stenographers, and other officers, the Senate has no power to transfer a portion of the sum appropriated for the pay of its members for the purpose of paying such officers. Id.

6. The state auditor must, under Kan. Gen. Stat. 1889, §§ 6583, 6597, 6676, take notice of the amount appropriated for a specific purpose, and, when that amount has been exhausted for that purpose, has no authority to allow or audit other claims against such appropriation, and issue warrants therefor. Id.

ATTORNEYS. See also ACCOUNT; EVIDENCE, 12.

1. Women will be admitted to the bar on equal terms with men, in the absence of a statutory or constitutional provision to the contrary. Re Thomas (Colo.) 538

2. The use of the masculine pronoun exclusively in the statutes relating to applicants for admission to the bar and to licensed attorneys is not sufficient to show a legislative intent to exclude women from the bar. Id.

3. Attorneys at law are not civil officers within Colo. Const. art. 7, § 6, requiring the incumbent of a civil office to be a qualified elector. Id.

4. The absolute disbarment of an attorney is justified where, upon receiving an unenforceable claim against his own client, he caused a complaint to be served in the name of another attorney, and then advised his client to settle, falsely telling him, with full knowledge of the facts, that the claim was good and could be collected out of his property. Fairfield County Bar, Fessenden, v. Taylor (Conn.) 787

5. Attorneys preferring charges against another attorney of unprofessional conduct, for the purpose of having him disbarred, need not show that they constitute a committee appointed by the bar association of the county for that purpose, either to establish their right to institute the proceeding or to give the court jurisdiction. Id.

6. The appearance as attorney in proceedings to enforce a loggers' lien on behalf of the claimant, of the notary public who administered the oath in support of the lien, is not unlawful. Sullivan v. Hall (Mich.) 556

1. The addition to the name of the depositor in an account with a bank, of the words "judge of probate, license money," is not alone sufficient to make deposits on such account special. Alston v. State (Ala.) 659

2. A bank which has received for collection a check which it forwards to its correspondent for that purpose cannot fulfill its obligation to the owner by delivering to him the correspondent's draft on a third person, drawn and used for transmitting the proceeds of the check, not to the owner, but to itself, and which has become worthless because of the insolvency of both drawer and drawee. St. Nicholas Bank v. State Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 241

3. The sending of a check by a New York bank to a Tennessee bank for collection in Texas does not constitute the contract for collection a Tennessee contract. Id.

4. Active vigilance to detect fraud and forgery is due by savings bank officers to a depositor on paying the deposit to one presenting the pass-book, although the by-laws provide that the bank will not be responsible for fraud in presenting the bank-book and drawing the money, where they also require its presentation by the owner, or his agent duly constituted by a writing signed and acknowledged, as a condition of payment. Kummel v. Germania Sav. Bank (N. Y.) 786

5. A savings bank pass-book is not a negotiable instrument, either by itself or in connection with an order signed by the depositor directing payment to a third person or bearer; nor can it be made so by contract. The account may be transferred, but the assignee takes it subject to the equities and defenses between the original parties, in the absence of facts creating an estoppel. McCaskill v. Connecticut Sav. Bank (Conn.) 787

6. The entry by a savings bank of a credit in a pass-book will not estop it from denying that a deposit was made, as against an assignee of the account, where the entry was procured by fraud, and the bank made it without knowledge of the material facts or any intention that the representation should be acted on,—especially where the assignee is not a bona fide holder. Id.

BRIDGES. See also COUNTIES, 1; INJUNCTION, 6.

1. Definite plans and specifications must accompany an advertisement for bids for building a public bridge, under a constitutional provision requiring bridge contracts to be given to the lowest bidder; and a statute permitting the commissioners to advertise at the same time for plans, specifications, and bids, and to adopt one of the offered plans with its specifications, and accept the accompanying bid, is unconstitutional. Fones Bros. Hardware Co. v. Erb (Ark.) 853

2. The Arkansas Act of March 18, 1879 (Mansf. Dig. § 1451), forbidding contracts in behalf of a county for which there is no unexpended appropriation, applies to contracts for bridges. Id.

3. The Arkansas Act of March 18, 1879 (Mansf. Dig. § 1451), forbidding contracts in behalf of a county in the absence of an appropriation, is not unconstitutional in its application to bridges as interfering with the exclusive jurisdiction vested by the Constitution in the county court over bridges. Id.

4. A statute imposing upon the county commissioners the duty to build all high way bridges of a certain class does not relieve the town in which one of them is located from damages for injuries resulting from the bridge being out of repair, where another statute gives cities and towns exclusive control over the bridges within their respective limits. *Wabash v. 2. The mere existence, during the storm which caused it, of snow on the deck of a ferry boat, raises no presumption of negligence on the part of the ferry company which will establish its liability to respond in damages to a passenger who receives injuries by falling on the slippery deck. Fearn v. West Jersey Ferry Co. (Pa.) 366

3. Stopping a train drawn by a dummy engine, with no regular stopping place, for a reasonable time on request to stop, is not the full measure of the conductor's duty, but before starting he must see that no passenger is in the act of alighting or in a position that will be perilous if the train starts. Highland Ave. & B. R. Co. v. Burt (Ala.) 95

4. A railway conductor who collects from a passenger boarding the train without a ticket, a less sum than the full train fare to his destination, may within a reasonable time, on discovering the mistake, require him to pay the deficiency, and eject him at the next station on his refusal to pay it, upon first refunding the sum paid less the fare for the distance actually traveled. Wardwell v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Minn.) 596

5. For refusing to accept the remaining part of a return ticket on the return trip, where the return part has been taken through mistake by the conductor on the first trip, and ejecting the passenger for refusing to furnish any other ticket or fare, the carrier may be compelled to pay damages. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Riley (Miss.) 88

6. A shipper's knowledge of directions to the carrier's agent not to receive certain articles for transportation will not relieve the carrier from liability if their transportation is actually undertaken. Bennett v. American Exp. Co. (Me.) 83

7. The ordinary carrier bill of lading exempting the carrier for loss by fire on cotton does not exempt the carrier from loss by fire while the cotton is in the possession of a compress company to which it has been delivered as the agent of the carrier, instead of at the carrier's own depot. Deming v. Merchants Cotton-Press & S. Co. (Tenn.) 518

8. A railroad company is liable for cotton burned in its car while entrusted to it for shipment, where the cotton would not have been destroyed but for the breaking of a drawbar in attempting to draw the train out of danger, although its bill of lading contains a valid clause exempting it from liability for loss by fire. Id.

9. Seizure of property in the course of transportation, by an officer without any warrant or other legal process, does not excuse the carrier for nondelivery. Bennett v. American Exp. Co. (Me.) 58

10. A common carrier by water who receipts for goods marked for delivery at a private landing cannot, without excuse or justification, deliver them at another landing without liability for the damages so occasioned. Stricker v. Leathers (Miss.) 600

11. A railroad company is not absolved from liability for injuries to stock transported by it, occasioned by the negligence of its employees, by a clause in the shipping contract providing that it shall not be liable unless written notice is given before removal of the property from the car, where it had a good, fair, and reasonable opportunity to inspect the stock before removal. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Temple (Kan.) 363

12. A contract by a railroad company for the transportation of horses and their delivery at its depot, providing for their storage unless called for, and containing stipulations in relation to unloading which imply that the company will unload them, requires the company to unload the horses at the place of destination, notwithstanding a usage of its agent there, known to the shipper, of requiring owners of animals to unload them. Benson v. Gray (Mass.) 263

13. A railroad company may, by special contract, limit its liability to the owner of stock or goods, so long as the limitation does not relate to its liability for negligence or misconduct. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Temple (Kan.) 362

14. A carrier contracting for the shipment of merchandise over lines other than its own, whether it has or has not an initial line of its own, may make a special contract exempting it from liability for loss by fire. Deming v. Merchants Cotton-Press & S. Co. (Tenn.) 518

15. A sleeping-car company is liable for the mistake of its servants in awakening passengers in its car, and causing them to get off at a water-tank half a mile from the depot, in the dark and rain, where they were left by the train, when the consequent exposure resulted in serious damage to them. Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Smith (Tex.) 215

16. The obligation to awaken and notify a passenger in time for him to prepare safely and comfortably to leave the train at his destination is directly involved in his contract for the use of a sleeping berth. Id.

3. Lack of money of the drawer in a bank to meet a check, where he would have provided for it or paid it if payment had been insisted upon, does not relieve the holder, who has taken it from an indorser on an antecedent debt, from his obligation to present it, or prevent his failure to do so until collection becomes impossible from operating as payment to the amount of the check. Id.

2. CONFLICT OF LAWS.

1. The courts of New York will construe the common law as applicable to a contract made and to be performed in another State, according to their own precedents, although they will follow the courts of such other State in the construction of its statute law. St. Nicholas Bank v. State Nat. Bank (N. Y.) 241

2. A loan is an Alabama contract, when the application is made, the money paid over to the borrower, and the notes and mortgage executed, in that State, although the debt is made payable in New York and the money was sent from that State to the mortgagee's agent in Alabama, to be paid over on the execution of 18 L. R. A.

the papers. American Freehold Land Mortg. Co. v. Sewell (Ala.) 289

3. The right to show that the obligation growing out of an indorsement of a promissory note is not absolute, but depends upon a collateral oral agreement, relates to the nature and validity of the contract, and not to the remedy, and is governed by the lex loci contractus. Baxter Nat. Bank v. Talbot (Mass.) 52

4. The mere fact of a difference as to the one designated to bring the action, in the provisions of the statutes of two States providing for the recovery of damages for the benefit of those injured by the negligent killing of a person, is not sufficient to prevent the maintenance of the action in the State where the accident did not occur, if the statutes are otherwise substantially the same. Wooden v. Western New York & P. R. Co. (N. Y.) 458

5. The plaintiff in an action to recover damages for the benefit of those injured by the negligent killing of a person, which is brought outside of the State where the accident occurred, in the courts of a State which enforces the liability because of the similarity of its statutes to those of the former State, must be the person designated by the statutes of the State where the injury occurred. Id.

6. The fact that the amount of recovery for the negligent killing of a person is limited in the lex fori and unlimited in the lex loci does not make the statutes of the two States so dissimilar that the remedy will not be enforced in the former State; but the amount that can be recovered will be governed by the lex fori,—at least where the killing was done by one of its corporations. Id.

7. A mortgagor's removal of personal property to another State, where it is seized and sold by his creditors on attachment, cannot affect the rights of the mortgagee, whose mortgage was duly recorded in the State where the parties resided. Hornthall v. Burwell (N. C.) 740

4. There is no unconstitutional discrimination against a nonresident widow, under U. S. Const. amend. 14, by making a conveyance by her husband of his property sufficient to cut off her interest if she was not then and never had been a resident of the State. Buffington v. Grosvenor (Kan.) 283

The utility of a disclosure required by statute from one convicted of intoxication, as to when, where, how, and from whom, he obtained the intoxicating liquor, which disclosure is to be turned over to the State's attorney, cannot be questioned by the convict or the court, as an excuse for a refusal to make the disclosure. Re Clayton (Conn.) 66

CONTRACTS. See also CARRIERS, 17; COMPROMISE AND SETTLEMENT.

1. A mere statutory obligation to pay money does not raise an implied contract to pay it. The liability depends on the statute itself. Davis v. Seymour (Conn.) 210

2. An agreement between all the next of kin of one who died a member of a benefit society, before anyone knew in whose favor the certificate was made payable, that the fund should be collected by the administrator and divided equally among them, is sufficiently supported by consideration in the mutual surrender by each of the chance to receive a larger share, and will be binding on the one who proves to be the beneficiary named. Royal Society of Good Fellows v. Campbell (R. I.) 601

3. A proposition to issue bonds to a railway company is in the nature of a contract, upon the acceptance of which both parties will be bound by the agreement. Wullenweber v. Dunigan (Neb.) 811

4. A mortgage by an administrator individually to himself as administrator, to secure an indebtedness which he owes to the estate, is invalid for want of contracting parties. Burditt v. Colburn (Vt.) 676

A parol agreement made in March, permitting one who was to take possession of a farm as tenant April 1 next, under a lease for one year, to use the ice in an ice-house thereon without charge, if he would refill it so as to leave it filled when he surrendered possession, is not void as not to be performed within a year from the making of it. Brown v. Throop (Conn.) 646

7. A verbal promise by the administrator of an estate holding a mortgage against a third person, to pay taxes assessed against the mortgagor if the collector will not levy on the mortgaged property, upon which he has no lien, is within the Statute of Frauds and not enforceable. Dillaby v. Wilcox (Conn.) 643

8. A stipulation in a written lease, giving the tenant the right to cut and use trees growing on the leased premises, may be waived by parol. Lee v. Hawks (Miss.) 653

9. Although a parol agreement to acquire the interests of all the tenants in common of real estate, convert the same into money, and pay over to each his pro rata share of the proceeds, is not enforceable under the Statute of Frauds, yet if the agreement is carried out so far that the title is acquired and the property converted into money, a trust will arise to pay over the proceeds. The trust, however, is not enforceable at law, unless the trustee has affirmatively recognized his duty to make the payment. Collar v. Collar (Mich.) 621

10. The first annual payment is optional with the obligor on a contract to purchase certain patents and inventions, which does not mention a cash payment which was made, but calls for annual payments for fourteen years amounting to $250,000, or, in lieu thereof, the sum of $100,000 at any time within two years, and provides that on failure to make any payment when due, within sixty days after demand, the "sale shall be null and void and of no effect," and the patents revert discharged of any obligations under the contract, with a further provision giving the obligor the right to assign the contract and thus free himself from personal liability. Williamson v. Hill (Mass.) 690

11. The rights of persons submitting bids for the erection of a building cannot be determined by the printed "notice to bidders," where it appears that the terms of the contract were orally fixed at a conference between the bidders and the persons requesting the bids, that the terms so fixed were not incorporated into the printed notice, and that both parties rested upon what was said and done at the conference. McNeil v. Boston Chamber of Commerce (Mass.) 559

12. A five years' restriction on the use of a secret process and trade-marks sold with the business is not an illegal restraint of trade,

18. A contract by a compress company to procure insurance for the benefit of carriers, upon cotton delivered to it for such carriers, renders it liable to them for failure to procure insurance sufficient to cover any loss that occurs. Deming v. Merchants Cotton-Press & S. Co. (Tenn.) 518

CORPORATIONS. See also FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES; NAVIGATION, 1.

1. The mere fact of the insertion, in certain corporate charters, of a prohibition to interfere with the navigation of streams, is no ground for construing a charter which does not contain such prohibition as authorizing such interference where it would be advantageous to the corporation. Connecticut River Lumber Co. v. Olcott Falls Co. (N. H.) 826

2. A majority of a committee appointed by a corporation to contract for the erection of a building may, in the absence of the other members, lawfully act in letting the contract. McNeil v. Boston Chamber of Commerce (Mass.) 559

Jackson* (Pa.) 779

6. One holding a bond for half the share in the proceeds of sales to which a stockholder in a corporation formed for establishing a summer resort will be entitled has no such interest as to give him a voice in determining the policy of the company, or to make his assent to or dissent from its proposed plans material. Attorney-General v. Abbott (Mass.) 251

7. A corporation is not negligent in permitting its president to continue in office and have access to its certificate book and seal, so as to make it liable for his act in issuing forged certificates of stock, by reason of his former misconduct in pledging his own shares to another person in violation of an agreement to pledge them to an associate. Hill v. C. F. Jewett (Pa.) 198

8. The forgery of the necessary signature of the secretary to certificates of stock, by the president of a corporation, whose only authority as to the issue of certificates is to sign them, does not make the corporation liable therefor to holders who took them in private and personal transactions with the president. Id.

9. A Maryland statute providing that whenever the laws of any other State impose upon Maryland insurance companies seeking to do business within its borders greater obligations or prohibitions than are prescribed for foreign companies seeking to do business in Maryland, the same obligations and prohibitions shall be imposed on companies of such State which shall seek Maryland business,—makes such foreign law the rule which Maryland will apply to companies of the foreign State asking permission to do business within its territory; and if a Maryland company is refused a license in the foreign State merely on the ground of discretion, the latter's companies may be refused license in Maryland on the same ground, although the Maryland statutes do not in terms authorize it. *Talbot v. COURTS.

1. An action to enforce the liability of a stockholder under the laws of another State in which the corporation was organized and judgment has been rendered against it, but no proceedings taken against him, cannot be maintained in a State in which the corporation has no place of business, notwithstanding that the parties, although both nonresidents, do not reside in the same State, and neither of them resides in the State where the corporation was organized. *Bank of North America v. 4. A court, to have jurisdiction of applications for naturalization or to receive declarations of intention under the federal statute, must, in addition to possessing a seal, have a clerk distinct from the judge, charged with the duty of keeping a true record of its doings and afterwards of authenticating them. Id.

COVENANT.

1. Damages to a tenant, resulting from an injunction obtained without sufficient cause by the lessor, which prevented him from cultivating the land, may be recovered in an action on the covenants in the lease, although there may be a remedy on the injunction bond. Hubble v. Cole (Va.) 311

Gross* (N. Y.) 653

3. No damages can be recovered for breach of a covenant of warranty in a deed given in consideration of love and affection, under a statute limiting the recovery in case of breach of covenants of warranty to the amount of purchase money paid, with interest thereon. McClure v. Melton (S. C.) 723 penalty, and not liquidated damages. Condon v. Kemper (Kan.) 671

8. "The penalty of $5,000 which is hereby named as stipulated damages" for violation of a covenant, made on the sale of a business, not to reveal a secret process or use trade-marks belonging to the business, is to be regarded as stipulated damages, notwithstanding the use of the word "penalty." *Tode v. EMINENT DOMAIN.

1. Permission to a water company to take water from a pond the shores of which have already been appropriated to public use, and also to take and hold all land necessary for raising, holding, and purifying it, impliedly authorizes the taking of previously appropriated land on the shore of the pond for a pumping station and filtering gallery, together with a right of way thereto, where such land is not indispensable to the prior appropriator, while the water company could only with difficulty, if at all, do business without it. *Old Colony R. 4. Although the presumption is that the establishment of harbor lines is for a public use in the interest of navigation, yet if the record shows that their purpose was to prevent a new bridge from being marred by the erection of structures on either side of and connected with it, the proceedings to take property therefor will be held void. *Farist Steel Co. v. 5. Compensation must be paid to a riparian owner by a city which in establishing harbor lines appropriates a portion of the land laying between high and low water mark adjacent to his property, under a charter which gives power to establish such lines, but preserves to landowners the same rights that they have under the section of the charter providing for opening highways, where the latter section makes full provision for compensation for whatever damage a landowner may suffer. Id.

6. The mere depreciation in the value of the lot of an abutting owner who does not own the fee of the street, by the construction of a railroad in the street, and his deprivation of the full use of the street, but without any invasion of or physical interference with his lot or any obstruction of his access thereto, is not a taking of his property, within the meaning of the constitutional provision as to compensation for property taken. O'Brien v. Baltimore Belt R. Co. (Md.) 126

EQUITY.

Equity has jurisdiction of a bill to determine as between the public and riparian millowners the proper form, dimensions, and place in a milldam of a sluice for running logs on the stream; and the suit is not barred by the fact that the dam is already erected. *Connecticut River Lumber Co. v. 1. An actual fraudulent intention is not necessary to constitute an estoppel in pais by representations made by one who knows or ought to know the truth, and may reasonably anticipate that they will be relied and acted on as true. Stevens v. Ludlum (Minn.) 270

2. Representations to a commercial agency respecting one's business, communicated to its patrons, estop him as against the latter to deny their truth. Id.

3. No estoppel against an injunction to restrain continuing trespasses by the operation of an elevated railroad in a street in front of plaintiff's premises arises out of his mere delay to bring suit for eleven years after the original trespass, and his occasional riding on the road as a passenger, though his only protest against the construction of the road was by subscription to pay counsel to prevent it. Galwey v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. (N. Y.) 788

4. A defendant in ejectment is not estopped to set up adverse possession by the fact that his grantor, after setting up the same defense in a prior action, had settled it by buying the plaintiff's title and giving his notes for the purchase price, and that the same plaintiff has brought a second action after a default in payment of the notes. *Greene v. I. PRESUMPTIONS; BURDEN OF PROOF.

1. The burden of proving voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger as a defense to an action for life insurance is on the insurer. Badenfeld v. Massachusetts Mut. Acci. Asso. (Mass.) 363

2. To hold the owners of an insolvent bank individually liable as partners for its debts, plaintiff must show that it was a partnership enterprise of which defendants were members; and until a prima facie case of partnership is made out the burden cannot be placed on defendants of showing that it was incorporated or was a limited partnership, to relieve themselves from liability. Hallstead v. Curtis (Pa.) 370

3. Where the cause of the accident by which a passenger was injured is known as well to the passenger as to the carrier, the presumption of negligence which arises from the mere fact of injury to a passenger while on the carrier's vehicle has no application; but the passenger must affirmatively show negligence. Fearn v. West Jersey Ferry Co. (Pa.) 366

4. The degree of care and prudence which must be exercised by a child to avoid the charge of negligence is measured by his capacity to see and appreciate danger, whether he is under or over fourteen years of age; and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, such capacity will be held to be that which is usual to children of his age and experience. Fourteen years is simply the age after which capacity is presumed, and the burden of showing lack of it placed on the child. Kehler v. Schuenk (Pa.) 374

5. There is no presumption of such want of capacity in a child as to render it irresponsible for its contributory negligence, in a case submitted to the jury, although in deciding a demurrer there may be such a prima facie presumption. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Ryles (Ga.) 684

6. If the absence of the books and papers of an insolvent bank affords a presumption as to its character, against either party to a suit to hold members of the concern individually liable as partners for its debts, it must be against plaintiff, where the documents are in possession of his witness in another State, beyond the reach of process, while defendants are simply small stockholders without means of reaching them or compelling their production. Hallstead v. Curtis (Pa.) 370

7. To sustain a tax upon land which is shown to have been legally exempt from taxation for a long period prior to the year for which the tax was assessed, the burden is on the tax officers to show that something had occurred before such year to remove the exemption. Allen County v. Simons (Ind.) 512

8. The assent of executors to a specific legacy is presumed where the legatees are in possession under it. Schley v. Collis (C. C. S. D. Ga.) 567

II. PAROL TO VARY WRITINGS.

9. Parol evidence is not admissible to vary the effect of a blank indorsement, where the 18 L. R. A.

statute provides that it shall have the effect of an ordinary indorsement. Spencer v. Allerton (Conn.) 806

10. The liability intended to be assumed by a stranger to a promissory note, who places his name on the back of it, may be shown by parol. Kingsland v. Koeppe (Ill.) 649

11. When a writing is shown to have been executed for the purpose of conveying an estate held in common to a trustee for sale and distribution of the proceeds, it is the best evidence of the terms of the trust; and unless it has been lost, parol evidence respecting the terms should be excluded. Collar v. Collar (Mich.) 321

III. DOCUMENTARY; EXPERT.

13. A deed excepting from the warranty "any right of way the public may have acquired" over the premises is inadmissible to prove the existence of such right, or notice thereof to the purchaser. Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Ryles (Ga.) 634

14. Returns of the value of its capital stock, made by a toll-bridge company to the state auditor as required by law, is competent evidence upon the question of such value, in a proceeding to determine the compensation to be made to the company for the taking of the bridge by the county. Mifflin Bridge Co. v. Juniata County (Pa.) 431

15. A letter written by the debtor, protesting against libelous duns from a collecting agency, and claiming that the debt has been paid, on which the creditor writes a reply, is admissible against the latter on a trial for criminal libel. State v. Armstrong (Mo.) 419

16. A portion of an envelope containing a libel is not inadmissible in evidence on a trial for criminal libel because it has been unnecessarily pasted in the information. Id.

17. A deposition taken in an action by deponent's wife, to which he was made a formal party, brought to recover damages for personal injuries to her, alleged to have resulted from a carrier's negligence, is not admissible in an action against the same defendant, prosecuted by the wife as administratrix of deponent to recover damages for injuries to him, alleged to have been received at the same time and place and through the same cause as those sued for in the first action. Fearn v. West Jersey Ferry Co. (Pa.) 366

18. In an action by a landowner to compel a company operating an elevated railroad in the street in front of his property to pay the damage done him by cutting off the easements of light, air, and access connected with such property, an expert witness cannot be permitted to state what, in his opinion, the amount of such damage is, nor what would have been the present value of the land if the road had not been built. Roberts v. New York Elev. R. Co. (N. Y.) 499

IV. DECLARATIONS; RES GESTÆ.

19. Representations, promises, and inducements, in the course of the canvassing and electioneering to induce freeholders to sign a petition for an election for the issuance of bonds to be donated to a railroad company, although made previous to the time at which said freeholders became signers, were nevertheless a part of the res gestæ. Wullenwaber v. Dunigan (Neb.) 811

20. Where two agents of a railroad company were engaged in the common purpose of soliciting freeholders to sign a petition for an election to vote bonds, and one made pledges and promises and held out certain inducements to said freeholders, who shortly afterwards signed a petition presented by the other, such pledges, promises, and inducements were a part of the res gestæ. Id.

21. A physician's statement as to what a person told him about her exposure, as the basis of his opinion as to the cause of her sickness, is not inadmissible on the part of the plaintiff in an action for damages sustained from the exposure. Pullman Palace-Car Co. v. Smith (Tex.) 215

22. In an action for personal injuries the plaintiff's wife may testify to exclamations of pain made by plaintiff on waking up during the night. Bennett v. Northern P. R. Co. (N. D.) 465

V. RELEVANCY AND MATERIALITY.

23. Evidence that a conveyance of his interest by a tenant in common to a trustee, to facilitate a sale of the property and distribution of the proceeds, was in fraud of his creditors, is immaterial in an action by him to recover his share of the proceeds of the sale, to which they are not parties. Collar v. Collar (Mich.) 621

24. Where one charged with fraud in the New York custom-house admits that sugar was valued there lower than in Boston, and claims that the Boston polariscope gives too high a valuation, evidence that it does not is admissible. Burt v. Advertiser Newspaper Co. (Mass.) 97

25. Evidence in a libel case that the libel has been published before is not admissible in mitigation of damages, except where defendant's libel refers to and professes on its face to be based on the former one. Id.

26. Evidence of the amount of plaintiff's salary and the number of weeks that he lost is admissible in an action for damages expressly claiming loss of time as an element of the damage. Pullman Palace-Car Co. v. Smith (Tex.) 215

27. In an action to enforce the alleged liability of a tobacco sampler to make good the loss resulting to a buyer because the tobacco in the cases was not as represented by the tags attached to the samples, evidence is admissible to show what meaning apparently ambiguous words and figures on the tags conveyed to the trade, and that by usage the sampler undertook to make good losses resulting from untrue statements on the tags. Conestoga Cigar Co. v. Hinkle (Pa.) 483

28. In a proceeding to determine the compensation to be made to the owners of a toll bridge which has been taken by the county, witnesses should be questioned as to the value, and not the cost, of the bridge. Miffin Bridge Co. v. Juniata County (Pa.) 481

29. For what sum the county could have erected a new bridge is immaterial in a proceeding to determine what compensation it must make to the owners of a toll bridge which it has taken for the use of the public. Id.

30. Evidence of specific indebtedness of the prosecutrix to other persons is not admissible in behalf of a defendant in an action for criminal libel. State v. Armstrong (Mo.) 419

31. A variance is created by proof of a policy which specifies no time for its continuance, under a complaint which describes it as running for one year from a certain date. Equitable Acci. Ins. Co. v. Osborn (Ala.) 267

32. A witness's testimony that she knows of nothing else which could have caused her illness except the exposure on which her husband's action for damages is based is admissible in connection with the details of her exposure and sickness. Pullman Palace-Car Co. v. Smith (Tex.) 215

33. Upon the trial of an action for malicious prosecution the plaintiff, when attempting to establish a want of probable cause, is not confined to proof of such facts as he can affirmatively show were actually known to defendant, but may also prove the existence of such open and notorious facts as would or should have been ascertained by the latter had he, before instituting the proceedings, made such inquiry and investigation as anyone with honest motives, and not actuated by malice, would have made. Tabert v. Cooley (Minn.) 463

VI. WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

34. Voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger which will prevent recovery of life insurance is not shown by the fact that the insured, while waiting for a train, was thrown or fell upon the track from a platform not intended for use in getting upon his train, or in fact for use by passengers at all, though they sometimes used it, but for train hands, and which was only about 24 feet wide in places where girders extended out from the wall. Badenfeld v. Massachusetts Mut. Acci. Asso. (Mass.) 263

35. The testimony of two witnesses or their equivalent is necessary to modify an antenuptial agreement, even on the ground of fraud. Lukens's Appeal (Pa.) 581

36. The voluntary dismissal of a civil suit is not, as a matter of law, prima facie evidence of malice. Smith v. Burrus (Mo.) 59

37. The doctrine of reasonable doubt as to guilt has no application in an action for malicious prosecution of a suit for slanderous words charging a crime. A preponderance of evidence is sufficient to make out a case for either party. Id.

88. Criminal acts need not be proved, in a civil action, by any greater or more certain degree of proof than is required in civil actions generally. Heiligmann v. Rose (Tex.) 272

Proc. § 2699, on granting ancillary administration, where the security already given in the place of principal administration is insufficient, although that section provides that the bond may, in the discretion of the surrogate, be in such a sum, "not exceeding twice the amount which appears to be due from the decedent to residents of the State," as will secure resident creditors. The section is intended to allow, but not to require, a smaller bond than in ordinary cases. Re Prout's Estate (N. Y.) 104

2. Moneys advanced by an intestate to his daughter and her husband, and treated by the parties as paid by his board, will not be held a debt due the estate on an accounting between the daughter and her husband and the administrator. Kelsey v. Kelley (Vt.) 640

3. FRAUD AND FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES.

1. False statements in a certificate required by Mass. Stat. 1884, chap. 380, § 3, to be filed with the commissioner of corporations to enable a foreign corporation to do business in Massachusetts, will not render the persons signing it liable for deceit to one who, relying upon them, takes the corporation's notes and thereby suffers loss. Hunnewell v. Duxbury (Mass.) 738

2. A conveyance by a father to his daughter in consideration of her marriage, made without intent on the part of either to defraud, is not fraudulent as to creditors, although the father is insolvent at the time. Cohen v. Knox (Cal.) 711

3. A disposition by an insolvent of all his property in consideration of future support, though fraudulent as to creditors, cannot be set aside at the suit of the latter after the death of the insolvent and after support to an amount greater than that of the property received has been furnished. Kelsey v. Kelley (Vt.) 640

4. The fact of fraudulent intent must be found to support a judgment setting aside a voluntary conveyance as in fraud of creditors,—at least unless the facts found absolutely exclude all possibility of the absence of fraudulent intent in the mind of the grantor,—under statutes making every transfer of property with intent to defraud or delay a creditor void, and providing that the question of fraudulent intent is one of fact, and not of law, and that no transfer shall be adjudged to be fraudulent solely on the ground that it was not made for a valuable consideration. Findings that the transfer was voluntary, that the grantor was insolvent, and that the transfer actually defrauded creditors, are not sufficient. Bull v. Bray (Cal.) 578

5. The liability of a surety on an unmatured obligation is a lawful debt, claim, or demand which will make a transfer of goods to him by the debtor, on his assuming the obligation, valid as to other creditors, under a statute giving "creditors, purchasers, or other persons" the right to take sufficient property from their debtor to satisfy bona fide claims. Frees v. Baker (Tex.) 840

GAME LAWS. See also COMMERCE, 3.

1. The game laws of a State can give no authority to take carcasses of animals or parts thereof, while in the course of interstate transportation, away from a common carrier, on the ground that the animals have been killed in violation of such laws. Bennett v. American Exp. Co. (Me.) 88

2. Common carriers are not included in the provision of Me. Rev. Stat. chap. 80, § 12, imposing a penalty on "whoever . . . has in possession" between October 1 and January 1 more than the number therein specified of the carcasses of certain wild animals. Id.

3. Woodcock, ruffed grouse, or quail need not have been killed for the purpose of conveying them out of the State in order to make it an offense, under Conn. Gen. Stat. § 2546, to have such birds in possession with intent to procure their transportation out of the State. State v. Geer (Conn.) 804

Bridgeport* (Conn.) 590

2. Under a charter provision that harbor lines established by a city may be laid out and designated by a committee appointed by the city council for that purpose, no legal layout can be made by the adoption by the council of a mere recommendation by the committee of the acceptance of a resolution previously passed by the council, to the effect that the lines be laid out. Id.

4. An injunction against the passage of a municipal ordinance may be granted at the suit of taxpayers who by reason of their business have a special or peculiar interest in the use of a wharf owned by the city in trust for the public, where the ordinance, which has been favorably reported by a committee, authorizes the illegal transfer of the wharf to an insolvent board of commissioners, which it might not be possible to prevent if the ordinance were passed, and which would result, if passed, in irreparable injury to the plaintiffs. Roberts v. Louisville (Ky.) 844

5. Withdrawal of an illegal ordinance after commencement of the suit will not defeat the right to an injunction against its passage. Id.

6. An injunction will lie at the suit of a taxpayer, to restrain the making of an unauthorized contract in behalf of a county for the construction of a bridge. Fones Bros. Hardware Co. v. Erb (Ark.) 353

7. A property-owner may maintain a suit to enjoin the rebuilding, in violation of a valid city ordinance, of a wooden building which has been partially destroyed by fire, although it would not be a nuisance per se, if it will work special and irreparable injury to him and to his property,—as, by diminishing the value of the property and increasing the rates of insurance thereon. Mount Vernon First Nat. Bank v. Sarile (Ind.) 481

8. The collection of a tax, part of which is illegal, upon property subject to taxation, cannot be enjoined without paying or tendering the amount for which the property is legally liable. Hyland v. Central Iron & S. Co. (Ind.) 515

9. A decree which attempts to enjoin a nuisance caused by the manner of carrying on a business should specifically point out the things which are to be done and to be refrained from in order to abate the nuisance. Ballentine v. Webb (Mich.) 321

INSANE PERSONS.

An aged person is not of unsound mind so as to require a guardian of his estate, merely because he has not sufficient strength of mind and ability to transact his business affairs with "ordinary care and prudence," if he is capable of transacting the ordinary business involved in taking care of his property, and understands the nature and effect of what he does, and can exercise his will concerning it with discretion, notwithstanding the influence of others. Emerick v. Emerick (Iowa) 757

INSOLVENCY. See also ACTION OR SUIT, 6.

1. A mortgage of real property, which has not been deposited for record with the recorder of the proper county before an assignment of the property by the mortgagor for the benefit of his creditors takes effect, is not a valid lien upon the property, as against the assignee or the creditors; nor does it become so by being subsequently recorded. Betz v. Snyder (Ohio) 285

2. An assignment for creditors takes effect, as to all persons, from the time of its delivery to the probate court of the county in which the assignor resides at the time of its execution. It is not necessary that it be also filed for record with the recorder of deeds. Id.

3. An assignment preferring some creditors whom it fails to specify either in the instrument itself or in an indexed schedule is void upon its face. Wolf v. O'Connor (Mich.) 688

4. A conveyance of property situate in Minnesota by an insolvent debtor to a creditor, which amounts to a preference unlawful under the State insolvent laws, may be avoided, although the creditor so preferred resides without the State. Macdonald v. Corunna First Nat. Bank (Minn.) 462

INSURANCE. See also CORPORATIONS, 9; EVIDENCE, 1, 34.

1. A creditor may lawfully take out a policy on the life of his debtor in an amount sufficient to cover the debt, with interest thereon, and the cost of the insurance, with interest thereon during the period of the expectancy of life of the insured, according to the Carlisle Tables, and may retain the full proceeds of the policy, regardless of the time of the debtor's death. Ulrich v. Reinoehl (Pa.) 438

2. A policy of insurance may be rescinded by the insured on discovery of misrepresentations in the application, made without his knowledge by the agent of the insurer, although the latter would be bound by the policy if it were not rescinded. Michigan Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Reed (Mich.) 849

3. Death resulting from a fight voluntarily engaged in, even if caused by a shot fired by one party just after the fight had ceased and the other had gone a few feet away, is within the exception of an accident insurance policy as to death caused by fighting. It makes no difference in such a case whether the slayer was sane or insane. Gresham v. Equitable L. & Acci. Ins. Co. (Ga.) 888

4. "Inhalation of gas" causing death, within the meaning of a clause exempting an insurer from liability, does not include the involuntary inhaling of deadly gas in a well where its presence is unsuspected. Pickett v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. (Pa.) 661

5. Death from asphyxia occasioned by deadly gas in a shallow well into which one descends to fix a pump is caused by external, violent, and accidental means. Id.

6. An injury received by slipping on the frozen ground while returning from a hunting expedition or a visit of pleasure to one in an adjoining town, on Sunday, is within the provisions of an accident insurance policy exempting the insurer from liability where the violation of law is either the proximate or remote cause or condition of the injury, under statutes prohibiting hunting and traveling, except from necessity or charity, on Sunday. Duran v. Standard L. & Acci. Ins. Co. (Vt.) 687

7. A man is not guilty of voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger within the meaning of a policy, because he runs toward an approaching train which does not stop there, to get the mail, and stumbles and falls down a bank against the engine. Equitable Acci. Ins. Co. v. Osborn (Ala.) 267

8. Leaving a car while in motion is not necessarily "a voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger" which will defeat a recovery on a policy which by its terms is avoided by such exposure. Badenfeld v. Massachusetts Mut. Acci. Asso. (Mass.) 268

9. Sunstroke or heat prostration is not a bodily injury "sustained through external, violent, and accidental means," within the meaning of an insurance policy covering such injuries, but expressly excluding liability for "any disease or bodily infirmity." Dozier v. Fidelity & C. Co. (C. C. W. D. Mo.) 114

10. The date of the policy, and not that of the attaching of the risk, must govern the question whether other insurance is prior or not, under a clause in a policy of marine insurance providing that other assurance prior in day of date shall be first applied in payment of a loss. Deming v. Merchants Cotton-Fress & S. Co. (Tenn.) 518

11. Where cotton burned in the possession of a compress company was insured by marine policies as to some of the owners, and by fire policies procured by the company upon a portion of its value for the benefit of carriers and owners, in part performance of contracts to procure insurance, the marine insurers are not entitled to contribution from the fire insurers until the carrier liability and that of the uninsured owners is fully discharged. Id.

12. A chattel mortgage given by one partner on firm property for his individual benefit makes a change of "interest," if not of title or possession, within the meaning of an insurance policy providing against incumbrances by chattel mortgage and changes in interest, title, or possession. Olney v. German Ins. Co. (Mich.) 684

13. A policy of insurance issued upon an unfinished building, with knowledge that it is to be occupied by a tenant not named, and conditioned to be void if the property is sold or transferred, or if the title or possession shall be changed from any cause whatever, is not avoided by a letting to a tenant for a term of five years, with the privilege to him to purchase at any time, and his absolute agreement to purchase at the end of the term, although the insurance company had no notice of the agreement to purchase. Smith v. Phoenix Ins. Co. (Cal.) 475

14. A married woman may sell and convey her right to recover upon policies of life insurance made payable to her without the intervention of a trustee, under R. I. Pub. Stat. chap. 186, § 8, authorizing her to sell and convey any of her personal property other than that described in § 5, with the same effect as though she was unmarried. Royal Society of Good Fellows v. Campbell (R. I.) 601

15. Agreement by the beneficiary in certain life insurance certificates, to the family settlement of the estate of the insured, which provides that they shall go into the general fund and be collected by the administrator for equal distribution among the next of kin; signing a power of attorney to enable the administrator to collect the money due on them; and leaving them with him,—amounts to an equitable assignment of the life insurance fund. Id.

16. An insurer of property, upon paying the loss, is entitled to subrogation to the right of the owner to recover from a carrier or bailee primarily liable for such loss. Deming v. Merchants Cotton-Press & S. Co. (Tenn.) 518

17. Where the owner of cotton delivered to a compress company as agent for a carrier, under an agreement that the compress company shall procure insurance thereon, has himself procured insurance, an advancement or loan by the insurer of the amount of its policy is a payment of the insurance which will prevent a recovery by either the insurer or the owner for the failure of the compress company to procure insurance, though made on the express condition that it shall be repaid upon such recovery, and though the insurance contract required such loan to be made. Id.

18. Arbitration is not a condition precedent to an action on a policy promising to pay a sum certain in case of death, although it provides that no suit shall be brought thereon unless the matter "has been first referred" to arbitration. Badenfeld v. Massachusetts Mut. Acci. Asso. (Mass.) 263

19. A provision of the laws of a mutual benefit society formed by the voluntary association of its members, that the determination of the tribunals of the society upon an endowment certificate payable on the death of a member shall be conclusive, and that no suit at law or in equity shall be commenced by any member or beneficiary, is not invalid as against public policy, in ousting the courts of jurisdiction. *Canfield v. INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

The agent of a common carrier is chargeable with aiding and abetting in bringing intoxicating liquors into a city to be sold illegally, where, knowing or having reasonable cause to believe that the purchaser intended to sell them illegally, he habitually delivered them to him, either personally or by his subordinates, although he did not know that the liquors were ordered until they came, and never had or could have anything to do with the transportation until they were brought to the city. Com. v. Brown (Mass.) 195

3. In an action on a joint contract, judgment cannot be rendered against one defendant by default and in favor of the others. Kingsland v. Koeppe (Ill.) 649

5. A joint verdict and judgment against several defendants, some of whom were never served and had not appeared, will be set aside on motion made at the same term. Haralson v. McArthur (Ga.) 689

6. A judgment by default will be set aside on application made at the same term, accompanied by an affidavit of merits, where defendant's attorney was absent on account of sickness, with leave of the court, and defendant was also absent because of a public announcement by the judge in open court that none of such counsel's cases would be taken up, and plaintiff's counsel knew that such counsel was in the case, although his name was not marked on the docket. Id.

7. Perjured testimony procured by bribery on the part of the successful party is not ground for setting aside a decree, although there is a reasonable certainty that the result of a new trial would be different. Pico v. Cohn (Cal.) 356

8. A judgment duly entered in one State on a warrant of attorney is as conclusive in all other States as in the State where it is entered. Teel v. Yost (N. Y.) 796

LIMITATION OF ACTIONS. See also ESTOPPEL, 8.

1. An equitable remedy to restrain continuous trespasses upon real estate is not barred by the lapse of ten years from the time of the original trespass, under N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 888, fixing that limit for actions the time for which is not otherwise specially prescribed. It will not be barred so long as the legal title is in the plaintiff and his right of action at law for injuries is not barred. Galway v. Metropolitan Elev. R. Co. (N. Y.) 788

2. An action cannot be maintained upon a simple contract to relieve property from the lien of a judgment, after the expiration of six years, although one entitled to benefit by the obligation is not damaged by its breach in having to pay the judgment himself until after the expiration of that time. McClure v. Melton (S. C.) 728

3. The five years' Statute of Limitations applies to an action to set aside the confirmation of a judicial sale of minors' lands at which their guardian had become the purchaser, notwithstanding the ground upon which the claim to relief is based is fraud. Hindman v. O'Conner (Ark.) 490

4. An action on a judgment recovered in 1879 in Illinois upon personal service of the defendant, and revived in 1888 according to the statute of that State, without jurisdiction of the person of the judgment debtor, is barred by the Nebraska statute providing that an action on a foreign judgment must be brought within five years from its rendition. *Hepler v. 3. A rule that no lumber, wood, stone, materials, or tools shall be placed within 5 feet of the rail, does not apply to a wing fence at a railroad cattle-guard. Id.

4. Placing wing fences at a cattle-guard 3 feet 10 inches from the rails at the bottom, and inclining slightly outward at the top, is not negligence which will render a railroad company liable for the death of a brakeman while hanging low on the side of a freight car looking under it to discover what was causing stones to fly therefrom, where no such accident had ever happened before on the road, or been anticipated, and no complaint had been made of the fences. Id.

5. A brakeman must be presumed to know the distance from the rails of wing fences at cattle-guards, so as to charge him with the risk of hanging low on a ladder at the side of a car in order to look under it. Id.

6. The mere fact that a servant comes in contact with exposed machinery, the danger of which is well known to him, but the risk from which he has not assumed, is not sufficient to show contributory negligence as matter of law, if his work was in its immediate vicinity and required close attention, rapidity of action, and considerable moving about; but the question is for the jury. Rouz v. Blodgett & D. Lumber Co. (Mich.) 728

7. A servant does not, by continuing his work at the command of the superintendent of the mill, assume the risk of injury from dangerous machinery which had, prior to the previous day, been enclosed, and which upon his complaint the superintendent promised to but did not re-enclose the previous night, although he promised in response to the servant's further complaint to fix it at noon, so as to prevent recovery for injuries received by coming in contact with the machinery during the forenoon. Id.

8. A railway employé injured in attempting to couple cars while standing between them on the short side of a curve is guilty of contributory negligence, where he had ample opportunity to observe that both drawheads were shorter than usual, and a rule of the company known to him required employés to take time to examine all drawheads before making couplings. *Bennett v. 1. A deed granting land for a certain money consideration, with a condition that, if the grantor shall support the grantee during her natural life and give her decent burial, the deed shall be void, otherwise it shall remain of full force and effect,—constitutes a mortgage which may be foreclosed on failure to fulfill the condition. Cook v. Bartholomew (Conn.) 452

2. An assignment to secure future advances, of a mortgage made to secure an existing debt is not within N. H. Gen. Laws, chap. 136, § 3, providing that no estate conveyed in mortgage shall be held by the mortgagee for any obligation or liability arising after the execution and delivery of the mortgage. Lime Rock Nat. Bank v. Mourey (N. H.) 294

3. A mortgagor's placing the mortgage, which he has executed individually to himself as administrator, without recording it, in a receptacle used for keeping papers belonging to himself and the estate, where it is found after his death, is not a delivery; and its subsequent recordation, by his successor, is ineffectual. Burditt v. Colburn (Vt.) 676

4. A mortgagee in possession does not lose his rights as such by the fact that his right of action for his debt had become barred by the Statute of Limitations; and he can still resist any action to deprive him of his security. Spect v. Spect (Cal.) 187

5. A mortgage on property given to secure payment of its purchase price cannot be kept alive against the mortgagor's estate in favor of one to whom the property was afterwards transferred, and who for his own protection had to make a payment contemplated by the mortgage, where it was never a lien on any other property of the mortgagor. McClure v. Melton (S. C.) 723

6. A mortgage does not merge by the acquirement by the mortgagee of the interest of the mortgagor after he has assigned the mortgage, although such assignment was to secure his debt, where he does not regain title to the mortgage. Lime Rock Nat. Bank v. Mourey (N. H.) 294

7. No entry for breach of the condition is necessary to enable a mortgagee to maintain an action to foreclose the mortgagor's right of redemption, although the mortgage is in form

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS. See also BREAD; BUILDINGS, 1; ELECTRICAL USES AND APPLIANCES; INFUNCTION, 4.

1. A municipal corporation was created by Or. Laws 1891, p. 791, incorporating certain cities named therein as the "Port of Portland," for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Willamette and Columbia rivers between those cities and the sea, so as to maintain therein a ship channel, and conferring on it power to borrow money and levy taxes in the furtherance of that purpose, within the meaning of Or. Const. art. 11, § 2, permitting the creation of municipal corporations by special law. Cook v. Port of Portland (Or.) 533

2. The intention to deprive a municipal corporation of its common-law powers will not be inferred simply because certain of such powers are enumerated and conferred upon it by its charter, while no mention is made of the rest of them. Mount Vernon First Nat. Bank v. Sarile (Ind.) 481

3. A contract by a city granting for twenty-five years the exclusive right to supply it with water is unauthorized and illegal as attempting to create a monopoly and surrendering the legislative power of the city. Allgelt v. San Antonio (Tex.) 883

4. A taxpayer cannot maintain a suit to vacate an illegal contract by a city granting an exclusive right for a term of years to supply it with water, in the absence of averments showing injury to him as a taxpayer,—as, that he is prevented from getting water on better terms, or that he is compelled under the contract to get water from the grantee. Id.

6. A debt is not incurred by a city at the beginning for the aggregate amount to become due on a contract for electric lights to be furnished for a series of years at a certain sum per year. The debt for each year is incurred only when it has been earned. Id.

7. A municipal corporation cannot escape responsibility for the nuisance on the ground that the structure is solely for public use, where, by filling a schoolyard several feet above its natural level, it has pushed over the retaining wall so as to encroach upon and overhang the premises of an adjoining owner. Miles v. Worcester (Mass.) 841

8. A city ordinance forbidding the keeping of inflammable or explosive oils within the city without license from the common council, and reserving to the latter the right to grant or refuse the license, dependent upon whether it deems the location and buildings suitable and the person a proper person, and that the license may be revoked at any time at the option of the council,—is invalid as permitting the exercise of an arbitrary discrimination. Richmond v. Dudley (Ind.) 587

10. A special license may be given for the use of streets by an electric-light company, although a general ordinance is necessary to make regulations as to the mode of using streets. Crowder v. Sullivan (Ind.) 647

11. An ordinance requiring the conductor and driver of a street car to keep a vigilant watch for all vehicles and persons on foot, especially children, and stop the car in the shortest time and space possible on the first appearance of danger to them, is valid under a charter which gives power to make ordinances not inconsistent with the general law, and to license and regulate the construction and operation of street railroads. Fath v. Tower Grove & L. R. Co. (Mo.) 74

dependently of the manner in which it is conducted, if the slaughter-house is situated in a new and sparsely settled portion of a city, in the neighborhood of stockyards and other slaughter-houses. Ballentine v. Webb (Mich.) 321

2. The noise made by hogs kept in confinement for the purpose of slaughter is not such a nuisance as to justify the destruction of a slaughter-house business for the sole purpose of ridding a neighborhood of such noise. Id.

3. That the existence of a slaughter-house depreciates the value of neighboring property is not sufficient ground to justify a decree interfering with the business carried on therein. Id.

4. A slaughter-house business will be destroyed by a court of chancery at the instance of persons who move into its neighborhood after it is established, only when it is injurious to health, where it is located at the outskirts of a city, in a locality where similar kinds of business are already established. Id.

4. One cannot divest himself of the office of tax collector by resignation, unless his resignation is accepted by competent authority. Id.

5. The acceptance of an office by one disqualified to hold it by reason of holding an incompatible office is not necessarily a resignation of the prior office, in the absence of a special statutory or constitutional provision giving it that effect. Id.

7. 4. A general averment that decedent was without fault, in an action brought to recover damages for the death of one killed by the fall of a highway bridge, is not overcome by specific averments that he was attempting to cross the bridge with a traction steam-engine, water-tank, and threshing-machine, so as to render the complaint bad. Wabash v. Carver (Ind.) 851

5. The complaint in an action to recover damages for slander of title by charging that plaintiff had broken the covenants of certain leases and forfeited all rights thereunder must aver facts sufficient to show that plaintiff had rights under the leases and that there were covenants to be broken; and the want of such averments is not cured by the fact that the leases themselves, from an inspection of which all such facts would appear, were attached as exhibits to the complaint,—at least where they were attached merely to identify the leased land. *Burkett v. A railroad company is liable for damages caused by an embankment for its track along the margin of a river the accumulated waters of which, in times of flood, had previously escaped on that side, but which because of the embankment overflowed the opposite side more than it had done before, and injured land there situated. O'Connell v. East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. (Ga.) 894

2. A railroad company is liable for injury to property by fire set by its engines through its negligent act, although not done on the same day or at the same place as the setting of the fire. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Cullers (Tex.) 542

3. A railroad company is not liable for damages from fire set by its engines, when it has used due care and has provided its engines with the best improved spark-arresters. Id.

4. Mere knowledge by a railroad company that many persons, including children, frequently pass through its yard in a populous part of a city and crawl under its cars stored upon its tracks, does not render it liable for injuries to a child under such cars by a sudden movement thereof by the negligence of its servants in running other cars against the end of the line hundreds of yards away. *Central R. & Bkg. It is not negligence to leave a common hand-car weighing from 600 to 700 pounds, 6 feet from a railroad track and 4 or 5 feet below it, a mile from the thickly settled part of a city and a quarter of a mile from the nearest house, and let it remain there over Sunday unlocked and unguarded, so as to render its owners liable in damages for the death of a boy eleven years old, who, while riding on it with other boys who had replaced it on the track, fell off and was run over and killed. Id.

7. The duty to keep a "person upon the locomotive always upon a lookout ahead," imposed upon every railroad company by Tenn. (Mill. & V.) Co. v. Hess* (N. Y.) 454

2. Granting a telegraph company a franchise to construct its line along and upon city streets will not be construed as an abdication of the police power over such streets; but if the poles and wires become a serious obstruction or nuisance therein, provisions may be made for their removal; and for that purpose the company may lawfully be directed to place its wires under ground, commissioners may be appointed to see that the work is done, and a contract made for the construction of conduits in which the wires can be placed, and, if after due notice they are not removed, they may be cut down. Id.

3. That under the Acts of Congress telegraph companies have the right to erect and maintain their lines along and upon the public streets of a city will not prevent the State in which such city is located from requiring the wires to be placed under ground. Id.

4. A stipulation in a telegraph blank exempting the company from liability for mistakes and delays in the transmission of un-repeated messages will not prevent recovery of the full damages occasioned by a mistake resulting from the negligence of the company's servants. Wertz v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (Utah) 510

TRADE-MARK.

1. No trade-mark can be claimed in the shape of a bottle in which extracts are put up for sale. Hoyt v. Hoyt (Pa.) 343

2. No exclusive right can be acquired by adoption in a cap label for a bottle, which was originated by a third person and has been used by him for years. Id.

3. Neither the shape of a box in which bottles of extracts are packed for purposes of trade, nor the mechanical arrangement of the bottles therein, is subject to appropriation as a trade-mark. Id.

4. Combining a label and a bottle cannot infringe a trade-mark, if the separate use of each would not have that effect. Id.

5. The International Cigar-Makers' Union, the object of which is "to promote the mental, moral, and physical welfare of its members," is neither a manufacturer, dealer, nor trader, so as to be entitled to protection in the use of a trade-mark. McVey v. Brendel (Pa.) 377

6. Equity will not protect a labor union in the use of a non-trademark label which it distributes to all its members to be placed upon their work, the object of which is to discriminate between union and non-union labor, and to coerce the latter into joining the union, by recommending to the public the goods on which such labels appear because made by union labor, and denouncing all other goods as the product of "inferior, rat-shop, coolie, prison, or filthy tenement-house workmanship." Id.

7. The goodwill and all trade-marks not personal in their character, of an insolvent manufacturing company, will pass to a purchaser at a sale of the plant by the assignee for benefit of creditors, under an assignment transferring all the property of whatever kind owned by the insolvent, and an advertisement of sale describing the property as "old, established, and valuable cotton-duck mills." *Wilmer v. TRIAL. See also RECEIVERS.

1. A verdict need not specify whether it is for actual or exemplary damages, where the issues of actual and exemplary damages are not separately submitted to the jury. Heilmann v. Rose (Tex.) 272

2. The jury are final judges of the law as well as of the facts in a prosecution for criminal libel, under Mo. Const. art. 2, § 14, although the judge should assist and inform them what the law is. State v. Armstrong (Mo.) 419

3. The attention of the jurors should not be drawn to the price for which they would be willing to suffer the injury for which they are to assess damages, in laying down the rules which are to guide them in making such assessment. Kehler v. Schwenk (Pa.) 374

4. A signature to a receipt by one receiving payment of a savings bank deposit, which does not seem exactly right to the bank officials, is sufficient to make a question for the jury as to negligence in paying over the money to him,—especially where the genuine and forged signatures are both in evidence. Kummel v. Germania Sav. Bank (N. Y.) 786

5. Whether or not a policy of insurance taken out by a creditor on the life of his debtor, to secure his debt, is so excessive as to be a wager policy, is a question for the court where the facts are not in dispute. Ulrich v. Reinohl (Pa.) 483

6. Evidence tending to show the organization of a bank under a legal charter, the holding of stock in it, and the receipt of dividends thereon, is sufficient to make a question for the jury whether the bank was not a corporation rather than a partnership concern. Hallstead v. Curtis (Pa.) 370

7. A nonsuit is properly refused in an action to recover damages for personal injuries, where the evidence shows that plaintiff was a weaver having charge of looms in defendant's mill; that a shuttle could not fly out of a loom unless the machinery was defective or out of repair; that plaintiff had no knowledge of and was not permitted to meddle with the machinery, but in case it appeared out of repair must inform a person employed for the purpose of repairing looms; that on the day of the accident one of the looms did not work right, the shuttle flying out and sticking; that the loom-fixer was called three times to repair the loom, and after making what repairs he thought necessary each time again set the loom running; that plaintiff watched the loom more closely than the others because afraid of its action, and that shortly after it was fixed the last time a shuttle flew out, inflicting the injury complained of. *Jacques v. 1. A gift by a will of the use of the profits of a plantation to a person, "under his superintendence," but not to be "bound for his past debts, or for future debts and liabilities other than decent and comfortable support," does not give him any absolute property in the profits, but he holds them as trustee for the remaindermen, except as to what he needs for "decent and comfortable support." Therefore such profits cannot be reached by his creditors. Day v. Slaughter (Va.) 212

2. A valid trust for the support of a person may be created which shall be free from his debts and liabilities. Id.

3. Municipal officers to whom, as such, money has been given in trust under authority of a statute, have no vested right therein which prevents the Legislature from transferring the trust to other officers; and this rule is not changed by the fact that the trust is private in its nature, and not one recognized as charitable. *Smith v. 2. The grantee in a quitclaim deed without warranty, who takes the property with notice that it is subject to a judgment lien, cannot, upon paying the judgment for his own protection, maintain an action against his grantor to recover the amount paid; and it is immaterial that the latter may have assumed payment of the lien by contract with a third person. *McClure v. 3. 1. Registering a qualified voter without his appearing in person as required by law, when done without fraudulent intent, is not punishable as a felony under the Kansas statute, which declares that a violation of the statute shall be a felony. State v. Bush (Kan.) 607

2. An Act requiring a voter to place a mark opposite the name of each candidate voted for by him does not conflict with Tenn. Const. art. 4, § 1, as imposing the requirement of education on the part of the voter in addition to the constitutional requirements. Cook v. State (Tenn.) 188

3. A ballot having on its back an "offset," or faint impression of the printing on a similar ticket, will not be rejected under Cal. Pol. Code, § 1206, as bearing any device, etc., designed to distinguish it, without proof that the impression was the result of design. Rutledge v. Crawford (Cal.) 761

4. The presumption is that an "offset," or faint impression of printing, on the back of a ballot, or a grease stain or small piece of sealing wax thereon, was the result of accident. Id.

5. A small piece of sealing wax or a small grease stain on the back of a ballot will not prevent counting it, unless it is shown not to be accidental. Id.

6. A ticket having the names of two candidates for judge and one for senator arranged and numbered in consecutive order cannot be counted for another candidate for judge whose name is written on the line for and in the place of the name of the senatorial candidate, which is erased. Id.

7. The use of an indelible pencil in erasing and substituting the name of a candidate on a ballot is within the spirit of, and a substantial compliance with, a statute which requires it to be done with "a lead pencil or common writing ink" in order to permit the ballot to be counted. Id.

8. Red ink is common writing ink within the meaning of such a statute. Id.

9. Erasing the name of a candidate will not prevent counting a ballot for him, under the California statute, unless another is substituted, or the words "no vote" written thereon after his name. Id.

10. The failure of a contestant to file a statement sufficient to show his own eligibility to a disputed office will not prevent relief to the extent of annulling the certificate of election of the opposing candidate, who has been illegally declared elected. Id.

11. An amendment of the statement of a contestant of an election may be made to show his eligibility, after the cause has been remanded from an appellate court. Id.

12. The name of the political party sufficiently appears at the head of a ballot, where it is combined in a vignette, without repeating the name in a separate heading. Shields v. Jacob (Mich.) 760

13. The regularity of either of the tickets nominated by the separate divisions of a split convention cannot be determined by election commissioners in preparing ballots, but they must print thereon the names of both sets of candidates, and give for each set the party name as certified by the committee presenting 18 L. R. A.

it, without addition or distinctive designation. Id.

14. The twenty days' limitation of the time "to adjourn or continue the trial" of an election contest under Ind. Rev. Stat. 1881, § 4761, begins when the board has first convened and organized to enter upon the investigation, although the trial does not begin at that time. English v. Dickey (Ind.) 40

15. The adjournment of an election contest at the request of the contestor, to a day beyond the time limited by statute for the investigation, absolutely discontinues the proceeding, and even the consent of the parties cannot keep it alive longer. Id.

WATERS. See also EMINENT DOMAIN, 1, 2, 5; EQUITY; HARBORS, 1; INJUNCTION, 3; RAILROADS, 1.

1. Riparian rights of the owner of lands upon the shore of navigable waters, to reclaim and occupy land under shallow water, may be dissociated from the upland by the owner, so that conveyance of the upland will not include such rights. Gilbert v. Eldridge (Minn.) 411

2. An owner of upland on the shore of navigable waters, who plats the same and the land under water into blocks and streets, dissociates his riparian rights from the upland, so that they do not pass by the conveyance of upland lots. Id.

3. An inland block purchased according to a map showing blocks and streets between it and navigable waters and under shallow water does not acquire as an incident riparian rights to reclaim and improve the lands under water opposite it, by the gradual wearing away of the shore until the shore line reaches it. Id.

4. The right of a riparian owner to construct dams and divert for manufacturing purposes the water of a stream which is used by the public for floating logs is limited by the extent to which it can be done without interfering with the public rights, which are measured by the capacity of the stream in its natural condition. Connecticut River Lumber Co. v. Olcott Falls Co. (N. H.) 826

5. The right of the public to float logs on a stream will not be presumed to have been relinquished by the grant of a charter to a manufacturing corporation giving power to purchase and hold real estate on the stream, improve the water-power, and make and maintain on or across the stream the works necessary to accomplish the corporate objects, unless such relinquishment is absolutely necessary to the exercise of the corporate franchises. Connecticut River Lumber Co. v. Olcott Falls Co. (N. H.) 826

6. Legislative authority to a manufacturing company to purchase, hold, and enjoy the powers and privileges of a corporation which had been organized to construct a canal around the falls in a stream used by the public for floating logs, subject to the duties and liabilities binding on said "rights, powers, and privileges," will subject the manufacturing corporation to a limitation which had been imposed upon the company not to interfere with the free passage of lumber down the stream. Id.

7. The abandonment by the State of the public right to float logs down a stream when it grants a manufacturing corporation the right to make use of the water-power thereon will not be inferred from the fact that the manufacturing business may be more important than the lumber business. Id.

8. The mere conveyance by the State of the bed of a stream which has been used by the public for floating logs will not operate as a relinquishment of the public right. To have that effect the intention must be distinctly expressed. Id.

9. If a judicial location of a log-way over a dam which has been erected for manufacturing purposes becomes necessary, the convenience of the millowners will be consulted so far as it reasonably may be without a violation of the public rights. Id.

10. The right of the owner of land bordering on a stream to use it as a pasture in a reasonable way is not affected by the fact that the waters are thereby made unfit for use, although the waterworks of an incorporated company have been established lower down, to supply the public with water from that stream. Helfrich v. Catonsville Water Co. (Md.) 117

11. The title to great ponds passed under deeds from Plymouth Colony, which plainly intended to convey them, although the intention appears only from the habendum clauses of the deeds, no mention of them being found in the granting clauses. Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. Fall River (Mass.) 235

12. The fact that a town was incorporated two years after the Colonial Ordinance of 1647, declaring the public rights in great ponds, became law, with boundaries nearly coincident with those of a prior private land grant, will not cause the territory embraced thereby to be treated as town property, in determining the application of the ordinance to ponds situated therein, where the town is not shown to have ever assumed proprietorship over the land or ponds, and they appear to have been always dealt with as private property. Id.

13. The rights in a great pond which had been appropriated to private persons, and was held by them as private property at the time the Colony Ordinance of 1647, declaring the public rights in great ponds, became operative, were not affected by that ordinance. Id.

14. Where a colony conveyed a portion of a great pond to private owners prior to the taking effect of the Ordinance of 1647, which declared the public rights in great ponds, neither it nor its subsequent grantee of the remaining portion could, as owner and apart from the exercise of sovereign powers, draw off the water of the pond to the detriment of the prior grantees. Id.

15. Although the Ordinance of 1647, declaring the public rights in great ponds, became applicable in Plymouth Colony as part of the common law, the fiction that the common law has existed immemorially does not require its application to transactions which arose prior to the Province charter which made such law applicable therein. Id.

3. A direction in a will that testator's real estate shall be sold whenever his widow shall direct, and the proceeds paid over to her, and that she "shall have power to dispose of the same by bequeath or as she directs,"—is an absolute gift of the money to her. Id.

4. No obligatory trust is created by a will giving all of testator's estate to his wife, with a request that, if she does not require the whole of it as a support, she will, at her death, will the remainder to certain other persons named. Bryan v. Milby (Del. Ch.) 563

2. 8. "The opposite party" whose testimony is excluded by Mich. Pub. Acts 1885, pp. 156, 157, is not a party on the record. Penny v. Oroul (Mich.) 88

157, as to matters equally within the knowledge of a deceased person, in a suit by the heirs, assigns, devisees, legatees, or personal representatives of the latter, means the opposite party in interest, and does not include an executor who has no personal interest in the controversy, which is simply one between the estates of two deceased persons. Id.
